THE WEST INDIAN:

A

COMEDY.

As it is Performed at the

THEATRE ROYAL

IN

DRURY-LANE.

BY THE

AUTHOR OF THE BROTHERS.

Quis novus hic Hospes?

LONDON:

Printed for W. GRIFFIN, at GARRICK'S HEAD, in CATHARINE-STREET, STRAND, MDCCLXXI.

THE WEST-INDIAN: A COMEDY.

As it is Performed at the

THEATRE ROYAL IN DRURY-LANE.

BRITISH MUSEUM

By AUTHOR OF THE BROTHERS.

LONDON:
Printed for W. GRIFFIN, at Garrick's Head, in Catharine-Street, Strand.
MDCCLXIX.

PROLOGUE.

SPOKEN BY MR. REDDISH.

CRITICS, hark forward! noble game and new;
A fine Weſt Indian ſtarted full in view:
Hot as the ſoil, the clime, which gave him birth,
You'll run him on a burning ſcent to earth;
Yet don't devour him in his hiding place,
Bag him, he'll ſerve you for another chace;
For ſure that country has no feeble claim,
Which ſwells your commerce, and ſupports your fame.
And in this humble ſketch, we hope you'll find,
Some emanations of a noble mind;
Some little touches, which, tho' void of art,
May find perhaps their way into the heart.
Another hero your excuſe implores,
Sent by your ſiſter kingdom to your ſhores;
Doom'd by Religion's too ſevere command,
To fight for bread againſt his native land:
A brave, unthinking, animated rogue,
With here and there a touch upon the brogue;
Laugh, but deſpiſe him not, for on his lip
His errors lie; his heart can never trip.
Others there are——but may we not prevail
To let the gentry tell their own plain tale?
Shall they come in? They'll pleaſe you, if they can;
If not, condemn the bard——but ſpare the Man.
For ſpeak, think, act, or write in angry times,
A wiſh to pleaſe is made the worſt of crimes;
Dire ſlander now with black envenom'd dart,
Stands ever arm'd to ſtab you to the heart.

Rouſe,

PROLOGUE.

Rouſe, Britons, rouſe, for honour of your iſle,
Your old good humour; and be ſeen to ſmile.
You ſay we write not like our fathers——true,
Nor were our fathers half ſo ſtrict as you,
Damn'd not each error of the poets pen,
But judging man, remember'd they were men.
Aw'd into ſilence by the times abuſe,
Sleeps many a wiſe, and many a witty muſe;
We that for mere experiment come out,
Are but the light arm'd rangers on the ſcout:
High on Parnaſſus' lofty ſummit ſtands
The immortal camp; there lie the choſen bands!
But give fair quarter to us puny elves,
The giants then will ſally forth themſelves;
With wit's ſharp weapons vindicate the age,
And drive ev'n Arthur's magic from the Stage.

EPI-

Dramatis Personæ.

M E N.

Rockwell, - - - Mr. Aitkin.

Melcour, - - - Mr. King.

Captain Dudley, - - Mr. Palmer.

Charles Dudley, - - Mr. Cautherly.

Major O'Flaherty, - - Mr. Moody.

Sidney, - - - Mr. Aitkin.

Palmer, - - - Mr. Bailey.

Varland, - - - Mr. Perkins.

Servant to Rockwell, - - Mr. Wheeler.

W O M E N.

Lady Bellmont, - - Mrs. Hopkins.

Charlotte Bellmont, - - Mrs. Abington.

Louisa, Daughter to Lady Bellmont, - Mrs. Bailey.

Mrs. Palmer, - - Mrs. Egerton.

Lucy, - - Mrs. Love.

Housekeeper belonging to Rockwell, Mrs. Bradshaw.

Chambermaids, Servants, Ladies, Gentlemen, Peasants, &c.

S C E N E, L O N D O N.

Dramatis Perſonæ.

MEN.

Stockwell,	Mr. Aickin.
Belcour, in Love with Louiſa	Mr. King.
Captain Dudley,	Mr. Packer.
Charles Dudley, in Love with Charlotte	Mr. Cautherly.
Major O'Flaherty,	Mr. Moody.
Stukely,	Mr. J. Aickin.
Fulmer,	Mr. Baddely.
Varland,	Mr. Parſons.
Servant to Stockwell,	Mr. Wheeler.

WOMEN.

Lady Ruſport,	Mrs. Hopkins.
Charlotte Ruſport, in Love with Ch. Dudley	Mrs. Abington.
Louiſa, daughter to Dudley, in Love with Belcour	Mrs. Baddely.
Mrs. Fulmer,	Mrs. Egerton.
Lucy,	Mrs. Love.
Houſekeeper belonging to Stockwell,	Mrs. Bradſhaw.

Clerks belonging to Stockwell; ſervants, ſailors, negroes, &c.

SCENE, LONDON.

THE WEST INDIAN.

ACT I. SCENE I.

A Merchant's Compting House.

In an inner room, set off by glass doors, are discovered several clerks, employed at their desks. A writing table in the front room. STOCKWELL is discovered reading a letter; STUKELY comes gently out of the back room, and observes him some time before he speaks.

STUKELY.

HE seems disordered; some thing in that letter; and I'm afraid of an unpleasant sort. He has many ventures of great account at sea; a ship richly freighted for Barcelona; another for Lisbon; and others expected from Cadiz of still greater value. Besides these, I know he has many deep concerns in foreign bottoms, and under-writings to a vast amount. I'll accost him. Sir! Mr. Stockwell!

STOCKWELL.

Stukely!—Well, have you ship'd the cloths?

STUKELY.

I have, Sir; here's the bill of lading, and copy of the invoice: the assortments are all compared; Mr. Traffick will give you the policy upon 'Change.

STOCKWELL.

'Tis very well; lay these papers by; and no more of business for a while. Shut the door Stukely; I have had long proof of your friendship and fidelity to me; a matter of moſt intimate concern lies on my mind, and 'twill be a ſenſible relief to unboſom myſelf to you; I have juſt now been informed of the arrival of the young Weſt Indian, I have ſo long been expecting; you know who I mean.

STUKELY.

Yes, Sir; Mr. Belcour, the young gentleman, who inherited old Belcour's great eſtates in Jamaica.

STOCKWELL.

Hüſh, not ſo loud; come a little nearer this way. This Belcour is now in London; part of his baggage is already arrived; and I expect him every minute. Is it to be wonderd at, if his coming throws me into ſome agitation, when I tell you, Stukely, he is my ſon?

STUKELY.

Your ſon!

STOCKWELL.

Yes, Sir, my only ſon; early in life I accompanied his grandfather to Jamaica as his clerk; he had an only daughter, ſomewhat older than myſelf; the mother of this gentleman; it was my chance (call it good or ill) to engage her affections: and, as the inferiority of my condition made it hopeleſs to expect her father's conſent; her fondneſs provided an expedient, and we were privately married; the iſſue of that concealed engagement is, as I have told you, this Belcour.

STUKELY.

That event, ſurely, diſcovered your connexion.

STOCKWELL.

You ſhall hear. Not many days after our marriage old Belcour ſet out for England; and, during his abode here, my wife was, with great ſecreſy, delivered of this ſon. Fruitful in expedients to diſguiſe her ſituation, without parting from her infant, ſhe contrived to have it laid and received at her door as a foundling. After ſome time her father returned, having left me here; in one of thoſe favourable moments, that decide the fortunes of proſperous men, this child was introduced; from that inſtant, he treated him as his own, gave him his name, and brought him up in his family.

STUKELY.

STUKELY.

And did you never reveal this ſecret, either to old Belcour, or your ſon?

STOCKWELL.

Never.

STUKELY.

Therein you ſurpriſe me; a merchant of your eminence, and a member of the Britiſh parliament, might ſurely aſpire without offence to the daughter of a planter. In this caſe too, natural affection would prompt to a diſcovery.

STOCKWELL.

Your remark is obvious; nor could I have perſiſted in this painful ſilence, but in obedience to the dying injunctions of a beloved wife. The letter, you found me reading, conveyed thoſe injunctions to me; it was dictated in her laſt illneſs, and almoſt in the article of death; (you'll ſpare me the recital of it) ſhe there conjures me, in terms as ſolemn, as they are affecting, never to reveal the ſecret of our marriage, or withdraw my ſon, while her father ſurviv'd.

STUKELY.

But on what motives did your unhappy lady found theſe injunctions?

STOCKWELL.

Principally, I believe, from apprehenſion on my account, leſt old Belcour, on whom in her dependance I wholly depended, ſhould withdraw his protection; in part from conſideration of his ſpoſe, as well knowing the diſcovery would deeply affect his ſpirit, which was haughty, vehement, and unforgiving: and laſtly, in regard to the intereſt of her infant, whom he had wholly adopted; and for whom, in caſe of a diſcovery, every thing was to be dreaded from his reſentment. And, indeed, though the alteration in my condition might have juſtified me in diſcovering myſelf, yet I always thought my ſon fafer in truſting to the caprice than to the juſtice of his grand-father. My judgment has not ſuffered by the event; old Belcour is dead, and has bequeathed his whole eſtate to him: we are ſpeaking of

STUKELY.

Now then you are no longer bound to ſecrecy.

STOCKWELL.

True; but before I publickly reveal myſelf, I could wiſh to make ſome experiment of my ſon's diſpoſition; this can be only done by letting his ſpirit take its courſe without reſtraint; by theſe means, I think I ſhall diſcover much more of his real character under the title of his merchant, than I ſhould under that of his father.

SCENE II.

A Sailor enters, uſhering in ſeveral black ſervants, carrying portmanteaus, trunks, &c.

SAILOR.

Save your honour! is your name Stockwell pray?

STOCKWELL.

It is.

SAILOR.

Part of my maſter Belcour's baggage an't pleaſe you; there's another cargo not far a ſtern of us; and the cockſwain has got charge of the dumb creatures.

STOCKWELL.

Pr'ythee, friend, what dumb creatures do you ſpeak of; has Mr. Belcour brought over a collection of wild beaſts?

SAILOR.

No, Lord love him; no, not he: let me ſee; there's two green monkies, a pair of grey parrots, a Jamaica ſow and pigs, and a Mangrove dog; that's all.

STOCKWELL.

Is that all?

SAILOR.

Yes, your honour; yes, that's all, bleſs his heart; a'might have brought over the whole iſland if he would; a didn't leave a dry eye in it.

STOCKWELL.

Indeed! Stukely, ſhew 'em where to beſtow their baggage. Follow that gentleman.

SAILOR.

Come, bear a hand, my lads, bear a hand.

[Exit with Stukely and Servants.

STOCKWELL.

If the principal tallies with his purveyors, he muſt be a ſingular ſpectacle in this place: he has a friend, however, in this ſea-faring fellow; 'tis no bad prognoſtic of a man's heart, when his ſhip-mates give him a good word, [Exit.

SCENE III.

Scene changes to a drawing room, a ſervant diſcovered ſetting the chairs by, &c. a woman ſervant enters to him.

HOUSEKEEPER.

Why, what a fuſs does our good maſter put himſelf in about this Weſt Indian: ſee what a bill of fare I've been forced to draw out: ſeven and nine I'll aſſure you, and only a family dinner as he calls it: why if my Lord Mayor was expected, there couldn't be a greater to-do about him.

SERVANT.

I wiſh to my heart you had but ſeen the loads of trunks, boxes, and portmanteaus he has ſent hither. An ambaſſador's baggage, with all the ſmuggled goods of his family, does not exceed it.

HOUSEKEEPER.

A fine pickle he'll put the houſe into: had he been maſter's own ſon, and a Chriſtian Engliſhman, there cou'd not be more rout than there is about this Creolian, as they call 'em.

SERVANT.

No matter for that; he's very rich, and that's ſufficient. They ſay he has rum and ſugar enough belonging to him, to make all the water in the Thames into punch. But I ſee my maſter coming. [Exeunt.

SCENE IV.

STOCKWELL enters, followed by a Servant.

STOCKWELL.

Where is Mr. Belcour? Who brought this note from him?

SERVANT.

A waiter from the London Tavern, Sir; he says the young gentleman is just dress't, and will be with you directly.

STOCKWELL.

Shew him in when he arrives.

SERVANT.

I shall, Sir. I'll have a peep at him first, however; I've a great mind to see this outlandish spark: The sailor fellow says he'll make rare doings amongst us (aside.)

STOCKWELL.

You need not wait; leave me. [Exit Servant.

Let me see (reads.)

"SIR,

"I write to you under the hands of the hair-dresser; "as soon as I have made myself decent, and slipped on "some fresh cloaths, I will have the honour of paying "you my devoirs. Yours,

"BELCOUR."

He writes at his ease; for he's unconscious to whom his letter is addressed; but what a palpitation does it throw my heart into; a father's heart! 'Tis an affecting interview; when my eyes meet a son, whom yet they never saw, where shall I find constancy to support it? Should he resemble his mother, I am overthrown. All the letters I have had from him, (for I industriously drew him into a correspondence with me) bespeak him of quick and ready understanding. All the reports I ever received, give me favourable impressions of his character; wild, perhaps, as the manner of his country is, but, I trust, not frantic or unprincipled.

SCENE V.

SERVANT enters.

SERVANT.

Sir, the foreign gentleman is come.

Another

Another SERVANT.

SERVANT.

Mr. Belcour,

BELCOUR enters.

STOCKWELL.

Mr. Belcour, I'm rejoiced to see you; you're welcome to England.

BELCOUR.

I thank you heartily, good Mr. Stockwell; you and I have long conversed at a distance; now we are met, and the pleasure this meeting gives me, amply compensates for the perils I have run through in accomplishing it.

STOCKWELL.

What perils, Mr. Belcour? I could not have thought you would have met a bad passage at this time o' year.

BELCOUR.

Nor did we: courier like, we came posting to your shores, upon the pinions of the swiftest gales that ever blew: 'tis upon English ground all my difficulties have arisen; 'tis the passage from the river-side I complain of.

STOCKWELL.

Ay, indeed! What obstructions can you have met between this and the river-side?

BELCOUR.

Innumerable! Your town's as full of defiles as the Island of Corsica; and, I believe, they are as obstinately defended: so much hurry, bustle, and confusion, on your quays; so many sugar-casks, porter-butts, and common council-men, in your streets; that, unless a man marched with artillery in his front, 'tis more than the labour of a Hercules can effect to make any tolerable way through your town.

STOCKWELL.

I am sorry you have been so incommoded.

BELCOUR.

Why, faith 'twas all my own fault; accustomed to a land of slaves, and, out of patience with the whole tribe of custom-house extortioners, boat-men, tide-waiters, and water-bailiffs, that beset me on all sides, worse than a swarm ſwarm of muſquetoes, I proceeded a little too roughly to bruſh them away with my rattan; the ſturdy rogues took this in dudgeon, and beginning to rebel, the mob choſe different ſides, and a furious ſcuffle enſued; in the courſe of which, my perſon and apparel ſuffered ſo much, that I was obliged to ſtep into the firſt tavern to refit, before I could make my approaches in any decent trim.

STOCKWELL.

All without is as I wiſh; dear Nature add the reſt, and I am happy (aſide.) Well, Mr. Belcour, 'tis a rough ſample you have had of my countrymen's ſpirit; but, I truſt, you'll not think the worſe of them for it.

BELCOUR.

Not at all, not at all; I like 'em the better; was I only a viſitor, I might, perhaps, wiſh them a little more tractable; but, as a fellow ſubject, and a ſharer in their freedom, I applaud their ſpirit, though I feel the effects of it in every bone in my ſkin.

STOCKWELL.

That's well; I like that well. How gladly I could fall upon his neck, and own myſelf his father (aſide.)

BELCOUR.

Well, Mr. Stockwell, for the firſt time in my life, here am I in England; at the fountain head of pleaſure, in the land of beauty, of arts, and elegancies. My happy ſtars have given me a good eſtate, and the conſpiring winds have blown me hither to ſpend it.

STOCKWELL.

To uſe it, not to waſte it, I ſhould hope; to treat it, Mr. Belcour, not as a vaſſal, over whom you have a wanton and deſpotic power, but as a ſubject, which you are bound to govern with a temperate and reſtrained authority.

BELCOUR.

True, Sir; moſt truly ſaid; mine's a commiſſion, not a right: I am the offſpring of diſtreſs, and every child of ſorrow is my brother; while I have hands to hold, therefore, I will hold them open to mankind: but, Sir, my paſſions are my maſters; they take me where they will; and oftentimes they leave to reaſon and to virtue nothing but my wiſhes and my ſighs.

STOCKWELL,

STOCKWELL.

Come, come, the man who can accuſe corrects himſelf.

BELCOUR.

Ah! that's an office I am weary of: I wiſh a friend would take it up: I would to Heaven you had leiſure for the employ; but, did you drive a trade to the four corners of the world, you would not find the taſk ſo toilſome as to keep me free from faults.

STOCKWELL.

Well, I am not diſcouraged; this candour tells me I ſhould not have the fault of ſelf-conceit to combat; that, at leaſt, is not amongſt the number.

BELCOUR.

No; if I knew that man on earth who thought more humbly of me than I do of myſelf, I would take up his opinion and forego my own.

STOCKWELL.

And, was I to chuſe a pupil, it ſhould be one of your complexion; ſo if you'll come along with me, we'll agree upon your admiſſion, and enter on a courſe of lectures directly.

BELCOUR.

With all my heart. [Exeunt.

SCENE VI.

Scene changes to a Room in LADY RUSPORT'S Houſe; LADY RUSPORT and CHARLOTTE.

LADY RUSPORT.

Miſs Ruſport, I deſire to hear no more of Captain Dudley and his deſtitute family: not a ſhilling of mine ſhall ever croſs the hands of any of them: becauſe my ſiſter choſe to marry a beggar, am I bound to ſupport him and his poſterity?

CHARLOTTE.

I think you are.

LADY RUSPORT.

You think I am; and pray where do you find the law that tells you ſo?

CHARLOTTE.

I am not proficient enough to quote chapter and verſe; but I take charity to be a main clauſe in the great ſtatute of chriſtianity.

LADY RUSPORT.

I ſay charity, indeed! And pray, Miſs, are you ſure that it is charity, pure charity, which moves you to plead for Captain Dudley? Amongſt all your pity, do you find no ſpice of a certain anti-ſpiritual paſſion, called love? Don't miſtake yourſelf, you are no ſaint, child, believe me; and, I am apt to think, the diſtreſſes of old Dudley, and of his daughter into the bargain, would never break your heart, if there was not a certain young fellow of two and twenty in the caſe; who, by the happy recommendation of a good perſon, and the brilliant appointments of an enſigncy, will, if I am not miſtaken, cozen you out of a fortune of twice twenty thouſand pounds, as ſoon as ever you are of age to beſtow it upon him.

CHARLOTTE.

A nephew of your ladyſhip's can never want any other recommendation with me; and, if my partiality for Charles Dudley is acquitted by the reſt of the world, I hope Lady Ruſport will not condemn me for it.

LADY RUSPORT.

I condemn you! I thank Heaven, Miſs Ruſport, I am no ways reſponſible for your conduct; nor is it any concern of mine how you diſpoſe of yourſelf; you are not my daughter; and, when I married your father, poor Sir Stephen Ruſport, I found you a forward ſpoiled Miſs of fourteen far above being inſtructed by me.

CHARLOTTE.

Perhaps your ladyſhip calls this inſtruction.

LADY RUSPORT.

You're ſtrangely pert; but 'tis no wonder: your mother, I'm told, was a fine lady; and according to the modern ſtile of education you was brought up. It was not ſo in my young days; there was then ſome decorum in the world, ſome ſubordination, as the great Locke expreſſes it. Oh! 'twas an edifying ſight, to ſee the regular deportment obſerved in our family: no gigling, no goſſiping was going on there; my good father, Sir Oliver Roundhead, never was ſeen to laugh himſelf, nor ever allowed it in his children.

CHARLOTTE.

Ay; thoſe were happy times, indeed.

LADY RUSPORT.

But, in this forward age, we have coquets in the egg-ſhell, and philoſophers in the cradle; girls of fifteen that lead the faſhion in new caps and new opinions, that have their ſentiments and their ſenſations, and the idle fops encourage 'em in it: O' my conſcience, I wonder what it is the men can ſee in ſuch babies.

CHARLOTTE.

True, Madam; but all men do not overlook the maturer beauties of your ladyſhip's age, witneſs your admirer Major Dennis O'Flaherty; there's an example of ſome diſcernment; I declare to you, when your ladyſhip is by, the Major takes no more notice of me than if I was part of the furniture of your chamber.

LADY RUSPORT.

The major, child, has travelled through various kingdoms and climates, and has more enlarged notions of female merit than falls to the lot of an Engliſh home-bred lover; in moſt other countries, no woman on your ſide forty would ever be named in a polite circle.

CHARLOTTE.

Right, Madam; I've been told that in Vienna they have coquets upon crutches and Venuſes in their grand climateric; a lover there celebrates the wrinkles, not the dimples, in his miſtreſs's face. The Major, I think, has ſerved in the imperial army.

LADY RUSPORT.

Are you pigu'd, my young Madam? Had my ſiſter Louiſa now yielded to the addreſſes of one of Major O'Flaherty's perſon and appearance, ſhe would have had ſome excuſe; but to run away, as ſhe did, at the age of ſixteen too, with a man of old Dudley's ſort——

CHARLOTTE.

Was, in my opinion, the moſt venial treſpaſs that ever girl of ſixteen committed; of a noble family, an engaging perſon, ſtrict honour, and ſound underſtanding, what accompliſhment was there wanting in Captain Dudley, but that which the prodigality of his anceſtors had deprived him of?

LADY RUSPORT.

They left him as much as he deserves; hasn't the old man captain's half-pay? And is not the son an ensign?

CHARLOTTE.

An ensign! Alas, poor Charles! Would to Heaven he knew what my heart feels and suffers for his sake.

SERVANT enters.

SERVANT.

Ensign Dudley to wait upon your ladyship.

LADY RUSPORT.

Who! Dudley! What can have brought him to town?

CHARLOTTE.

Dear, Madam, 'tis Charles Dudley, 'tis your nephew.

LADY RUSPORT.

Nephew! I renounce him as my nephew; Sir Oliver renounced him as his grandson: wasn't he son of the eldest daughter, and only male descendant of Sir Oliver; and didn't he cut him off with a shilling? Didn't the poor dear good man leave his whole fortune to me, except a small annuity to my maiden sister, who spoiled her constitution with nursing him? And, depend upon it, not a penny of that fortune shall ever be disposed of otherwise than according to the will of the donor. (CHARLES DUDLEY enters.) So young man, whence come you? What brings you to town?

CHARLES.

If there is any offence in my coming to town, your ladyship is in some degree responsible for it, for part of my errand was to pay my duty here.

LADY RUSPORT.

I hope you have some better excuse than all this.

CHARLES.

'Tis true, madam, I have other motives; but, if I consider my trouble repaid by the pleasure I now enjoy, I should hope my aunt would not think my company the less welcome for the value I set upon her's.

LADY RUSPORT.

Coxcomb! And where is your father, child; and your sister? Are they in town too?

CHARLES.

They are.

LADY RUSPORT.

Ridiculous! I don't know what people do in London, who have no money to ſpend in it.

CHARLOTTE.

Dear Madam, ſpeak more kindly to your nephew; how can you oppreſs a youth of his ſenſibility?

LADY RUSPORT.

Miſs Ruſport, I inſiſt upon your retiring to your apartment; when I want your advice I'll ſend to you. (Exit CHARLOTTE.) So you have put on a red coat too, as well as your father; 'tis plain what value you ſet upon the good advice Sir Oliver uſed to give you; how often has he caution'd you againſt the army?

CHARLES.

Had it pleaſed my grandfather to enable me to have obeyed his caution, I would have done it; but you well know how deſtitute I am; and 'tis not to be wonder'd at if I prefer the ſervice of my king to that of any other maſter.

LADY RUSPORT.

Well, well, take your own courſe; 'tis no concern of mine: you never conſulted me.

CHARLES.

I frequently wrote to your ladyſhip, but could obtain no anſwer; and, ſince my grandfather's death, this is the firſt opportunity I have had of waiting upon you.

LADY RUSPORT.

I muſt deſire you not to mention the death of that dear good man in my hearing, my ſpirits cannot ſupport it.

CHARLES.

I ſhall obey you; permit me to ſay, that, as that event has richly ſupplied you with the materials of bounty, the diſtreſſes of my family can furniſh you with objects of it.

LADY RUSPORT.

The diſtreſſes of your family, child, are quite out of the queſtion at preſent; had Sir Oliver been pleaſed to conſider them, I ſhould have been well content; but he has abſolutely taken no notice of you in his will, and that to me muſt and ſhall be a law. Tell your father and your ſiſter I totally diſapprove of their coming up to town.

CHARLES.

Muſt I tell my father that, before your ladyſhip knows the motive that brought him hither? Allur'd by the offer of exchanging for a commiſſion on full pay, the veteran, after thirty years ſervice, prepares to encounter the fatal heats of Senegambia; but wants a ſmall ſupply to equip him for the expedition.

SERVANT enters.

SERVANT.

Major O'Flaherty to wait upon your ladyſhip.

MAJOR enters.

MAJOR.

Spare your ſpeeches, young man, don't you think her ladyſhip can take my word for that? I hope, madam, 'tis evidence enough, of my being preſent, when I've the honour of telling you ſo myſelf.

LADY RUSPORT.

Major O'Flaherty, I am rejoiced to ſee you. Nephew Dudley, you perceive I'm engaged.

CHARLES.

I ſhall not intrude upon your ladyſhip's more agreeable engagements. I preſume I have my anſwer.

LADY RUSPORT.

Your anſwer, child! what anſwer can you poſſibly expect; or how can your romantic father ſuppoſe that I am to abet him in all his idle and extravagant undertakings? Come, Major, let me ſhew you the way into my dreſſing-room; and let us leave this young adventurer to his meditations. [Exit.

O'FLAHERTY.

I follow you, my lady. Young gentleman, your obedient! Upon my conſcience, as fine a young fellow as I wou'd wiſh to clap my eyes on: he might have anſwered my ſalute, however—well, let it paſs; Fortune, perhaps, frowns upon the poor lad; ſhe's a damn'd flippery lady, and very apt to jilt us poor fellows, that wear cockades in our hats. Fare-thee-well, honey, whoever thou art. [Exit.

CHARLES.

So much for the virtues of a Puritan; out upon it, her heart is flint; yet that woman, that aunt of mine, without one worthy particle in her compoſition, wou'd, I dare be ſworn, as ſoon ſet her foot in a peſt-houſe, as in a play-houſe. (going)

(Miss RUSPORT enters to him.)

CHARLOTTE.

Stop, ſtay a little, Charles, whither are you going in ſuch haſte?

CHARLES.

Madam; Miſs Ruſport; what are your commands?

CHARLOTTE.

Why ſo reſerved? We had uſed to anſwer to no other names than thoſe of Charles and Charlotte.

CHARLES.

What ails you? you've been weeping.

CHARLOTTE.

No, no; or if I have—your eyes are full too; but I have a thouſand things to ſay to you: before you go, tell me, I conjure you, where you are to be found; here give me your direction; write it upon the back of this viſiting ticket—Have you a pencil?

CHARLES.

I have; but why ſhou'd you deſire to find us out? 'tis a poor little inconvenient place; my ſiſter has no apartment fit to receive you in.

(Servant enters.)

SERVANT.

Madam, my lady deſires your company directly.

CHARLOTTE.

I am coming—well, have you wrote it? give it me. O Charles! either you do not, or you will not, underſtand me. (Exeunt ſeverally.)

END OF THE FIRST ACT.

ACT II. SCENE I.

(A room in FULMER'S House.)

FULMER and Mrs. FULMER.

MRS. FULMER.

Why, how you ſit, muſing and mopeing, ſighing and deſponding! I'm aſhamed of you, Mr. Fulmer: is this the country you deſcribed to me, a ſecond Eldorado, rivers of gold and rocks of diamonds? You found me in a pretty ſnug retir'd way of life at Bologne, out of the noiſe and buſtle of the world, and wholly at my eaſe; you, indeed, was upon the wing, with a fiery perſecution at your back: but, like a true ſon of Loyola, you had then a thouſand ingenious devices to repair your fortune; and this your native country was to be the ſcene of your performances: fool that I was, to be inveigled into it by you; but thank Heaven, our partnerſhip is revocable: I am not your wedded wife, praiſed be my ſtars! for what have we got, whom have we gull'd but ourſelves; which of all your trains has taken fire; even this poor expedient of your bookſeller's ſhop ſeems abandoned, for if a chance cuſtomer drops in, who is there, pray, to help him to what he wants?

FULMER.

Patty, you know it is not upon ſlight grounds that I deſpair; there had us'd to be a livelihood to be pickt up in this country, both for the honeſt and diſhoneſt; I have tried each walk, and am likely to ſtarve at laſt: there is not a point to which the wit and faculty of man can turn, that I have not ſet mine to; but in vain, I am beat through every quarter of the compaſs.

MRS. FULMER.

Ah! common efforts all: ſtrike me a maſter ſtroke, Mr. Fulmer, if you wiſh to make any figure in this country.

FULMER.

But where, how, and what? I have bluſtered for prerogative; I have bellowed for freedom; I have offered to ſerve my country; I have engaged to betray it; a maſter-ſtroke, truly; why, I have talk'd treaſon, writ treaſon, and if a man can't live by that he can live by nothing. Here I ſet up as a bookſeller; why men left off reading; and if I was to turn butcher, I believe, by my conſcience they'd leave off eating.

(CAPT. DUDLEY croſſes the ſtage).

MRS. FULMER.

Why there now's your lodger, old Captain Dudley; as he calls himſelf; there's no flint without fire; ſomething might be ſtruck out of him, if you'd the wit to find the way.

FULMER.

Hang him, an old dry ſkin'd curmudgeon; you may as well think to get truth out of a courtier, or candour out of a critic: I can make nothing of him; beſides, he's poor, and therefore not for our purpoſe.

MRS. FULMER.

The more fool he! Wou'd any man be poor that had ſuch a prodigy in his poſſeſſion?

FULMER.

His daughter, you mean; ſhe is indeed uncommonly beautiful.

MRS. FULMER.

Beautiful! Why ſhe need only be ſeen to have the firſt men in the kingdom at her feet. Egad, I wiſh I had the leaſing of her beauty; what wou'd ſome of our young Nabobs give——?

FULMER.

Huſh; here comes the captain; good girl, leave us to ourſelves, and let me try what I can make of him.

MRS. FULMER.

Captain, truely; i'faith I'd have a regiment, had I ſuch a daughter, before I was three months older. [Exit.

SCENE II.

CAPT. DUDLEY enters to him.

FULMER.

Captain Dudley, good morning to you.

DUDLEY.

Mr. Fulmer, I have borrow'd a book from your ſhop; 'tis the ſixth volume of my deceaſed friend Triſtram: he is a flattering writer to us poor ſoldiers; and the divine ſtory of Le Fevre, which makes part of this book, in my opinion of it, does honour not to its author only, but to human nature.

FULMER.

He is an author I keep in the way of trade, but one I never reliſh'd; he is much too looſe and profligate for my taſte.

DUDLEY.

That's being too ſevere: I hold him to be a moraliſt in the nobleſt ſenſe; he plays indeed with the fancy, and ſometimes perhaps too wantonly; but while he thus deſignedly maſks his main attack, he comes at once upon the heart; refines, amends it, ſoftens it; beats down each ſelfiſh barrier from about it, and opens every ſluice of pity and benevolence.

FULMER.

We of the catholic perſuaſion are not much bound to him.——Well, Sir, I ſhall not oppoſe your opinion; a favourite author is like a favourite miſtreſs; and there you know, Captain, no man likes to have his taſte arraigned.

DUDLEY.

Upon my word, Sir, I don't know what a man likes in that caſe; 'tis an experiment I never made.

FULMER.

Sir!—Are you ſerious?

DUDLEY.

'Tis of little conſequence whether you think ſo.

FULMER.

What a formal old prig it is! (aſide). I apprehend you, Sir; you ſpeak with caution; you are married?

DUDLEY.

I have been.

FULMER.

And this young lady, which accompanies you—

DUDLEY.

Paſſes for my daughter.

FULMER.

Paſſes for his daughter! humph—(aſide) She is exceedingly beautiful, finely accompliſh'd, of a moſt enchanting ſhape and air——

DUDLEY.

You are much too partial; she has the greateſt defect a woman can have.

FULMER.

How ſo, pray?

DUDLEY.

She has no fortune.

FULMER.

Rather ſay that you have none; and that's a ſore defect in one of your years, Captain Dudley: you've ſerv'd, no doubt?

DUDLEY.

Familiar coxcomb! But I'll humour him (aſide).

FULMER.

A cloſe old fox! But I'll unkennel him (aſide).

DUDLEY.

Above thirty years I've been in the ſervice, Mr. Fulmer.

FULMER.

I gueſs'd as much; I laid it at no leſs: why 'tis a wearifome time; 'tis an apprenticeſhip to a profeſſion, fit only for a patriarch. But preferment muſt be cloſely follow'd: you never could have been ſo far behind-hand in the chace, unleſs you had palpably miſtaken your way. You'll pardon me, but I begin to perceive you have lived in the world, not with it.

DUDLEY.

It may be ſo; and you perhaps can give me better council. I'm now ſoliciting a favour; an exchange to a company on full pay; nothing more; and yet I meet a thouſand bars to that; tho', without boaſting, I ſhould think the certificate of ſervices, which I ſent in, might have purchaſed that indulgence to me.

FULMER.

Who thinks or cares about 'em? Certificate of ſervices, indeed! Send in a certificate of your fair daughter; carry her in your hand with you.

DUDLEY.

What! Who! My daughter! Carry my daughter; well, and what then?

FULMER.

Why then your fortune's made, that's all.

DUDLEY.

I underſtand you: and this you call knowledge of the world? Deſpicable knowledge; but, ſirrah, I will have you know— (threatening him).

FULMER.

Help! Who's within? Wou'd you ſtrike me, Sir; wou'd you liſt up your hand againſt a man in his own houſe?

DUDLEY.

In a church, if he dare inſult the poverty of a man of honour.

FULMER.

Have a care what you do; remember there is ſuch a thing in law as an aſſault and battery; ay, and ſuch trifling forms as warrants and indictments.

DUDLEY.

Go, Sir; you are too mean for my reſentment; 'tis that, and not the law, protects you. Hence!

FULMER.

An old, abſurd, incorrigible blockhead! I'll be revenge'd of him (aſide). [Exit.

SCENE III.

YOUNG DUDLEY enters to him.

CHARLES.

What is the matter, Sir? Sure I heard an outcry as I enter'd the houſe.

DUDLEY.

Not unlikely; our landlord and his wife are for ever wrangling.—Did you find your aunt Dudley at home?

CHARLES.

I did.

DUDLEY.

And what was your reception?

CHARLES.

Cold as our poverty, and her pride, could make it.

DUDLEY.

You told her the preſſing occaſion I had for a ſmall ſupply to equip me for this exchange; has ſhe granted me the relief I aſk'd?

CHARLES.

Alas! Sir, ſhe has peremptorily refuſed it.

DUDLEY.

That's hard; that's hard, indeed! My petition was for a ſmall ſum; ſhe has refuſed it, you ſay: well, be it ſo; I muſt not complain. Did you ſee the broker about the inſurance on my life?

CHARLES.

There again I am the meſſenger of ill news; I can raiſe no money, ſo fatal is the climate: alas! that ever my father ſhou'd be ſent to periſh in ſuch a place!

SCENE IV.

Miss DUDLEY enters haſtily.

DUDLEY.

Louiſa, what's the matter? you ſeem frighted.

LOUISA.

I am, indeed: coming from Miſs Ruſport's, I met a young gentleman in the ſtreets, who has beſet me in the ſtrangeſt manner.

CHARLES.

Inſufferable! Was he rude to you?

LOUISA.

I cannot ſay he was abſolutely rude to me, but he was very importunate to ſpeak to me, and once or twice attempted to lift up my hat: he follow'd me to the corner of the ſtreet, and there I gave him the ſlip.

DUDLEY.

You muſt walk no more in the ſtreets, child, without me or your brother.

LOUISA.

O Charles! Miſs Ruſport deſires to ſee you directly; Lady Ruſport is gone out, and ſhe has ſomething particular to ſay to you.

CHARLES.

Have you any commands for me, Sir?

DUDLEY.

None, my dear; by all means wait upon Miſs Ruſport. Come, Louiſa, I ſhall deſire you to go up to your chamber, and compoſe yourſelf. [Exeunt.

SCENE V.

BELCOUR enters, after peeping in at the Door.

BELCOUR.

Not a ſoul, as I'm alive. Why, what an odd ſort of a houſe this is! Confound the little jilt, ſhe has fairly given the ſlip. A plague upon this London, I ſhall have no luck in it: ſuch a crowd, and ſuch a hurry, and ſuch a number of ſhops, and one ſo like the other, that whether the wench turn'd into this houſe or the next, or whether ſhe went up ſtairs or down ſtairs, (for there's a world above and a world below, it ſeems) I declare, I know no more than if I was in the blue mountains. In the name of all the devils at once, why did ſhe run away? If every handſome girl I meet in this town is to lead me ſuch a wild gooſe chace, I had better have ſtaid in the torrid zone: I ſhall be waſted to the ſize of a ſugar cane: what ſhall I do? Give the chace up: hang it, that's cowardly: ſhall I, a true-born ſon of Phœbus, ſuffer this little nimble-footed Daphne to eſcape me——"Forbid it honour, and forbid it love." Huſh! huſh! here ſhe comes! Oh! the devil! What tawdry thing have we got here?

MRS. FULMER enters to him.

MRS. FULMER.

Your humble ſervant, Sir.

BELCOUR.

Your humble ſervant, Madam.

MRS. FULMER.

A fine ſummer's day, Sir.

BELCOUR.

Yes, ma'am, and ſo cool, that if the calendar didn't call it July, I ſhould ſwear it was January.

MRS. FULMER.

Sir!

BELCOUR.

Madam!

MRS. FULMER.

Do you wiſh to ſpeak to Mr. Fulmer, Sir?

BELCOUR.

Mr. Fulmer, Madam? I havn't the honour of knowing ſuch a perſon.

MRS. FULMER.

No, I'll be ſworn, have you not; thou art much too pretty a fellow, and too much of a gentleman to be an author thyſelf, or to have any thing to ſay to thoſe that are ſo. 'Tis the captain, I ſuppoſe, you are waiting for.

BELCOUR.

I rather ſuſpect it is the Captain's wife.

MRS. FULMER.

The Captain has no wife, Sir.

BELCOUR.

No wife? I'm heartily ſorry for it; for then ſhe's his miſtreſs; and that I take to be the more deſperate caſe of the two: pray, Madam, wasn't there a lady juſt now turn'd into your houſe? 'Twas with her I wiſh'd to ſpeak.

MRS. FULMER.

What ſort of a lady, pray?

BELCOUR.

One of the loveliest ſort my eyes ever beheld; young, tall, freſh, fair; in ſhort, a goddeſs.

MRS. FULMER.

Nay, but dear, dear Sir, how I'm ſure you flatter; for 'twas me you followed into the ſhop door this minute.

BELCOUR.

You! No, no, take my word for it, it was not you, Madam.

MRS. FULMER.

But what is it you laugh at?

BELCOUR.

Upon my ſoul, I aſk your pardon; but it was not you, believe me; be aſſured it wasn't.

MRS. FULMER.

Well, Sir, I ſhall not contend for the honour of being noticed by you; I hope you think you wouldn't have been the firſt man that noticed me in the ſtreets; however, this I'm poſitive of, that no living woman but myſelf has entered theſe doors this morning.

BELCOUR.

Wy then I'm miſtaken in the houſe, that's all; for 'tis not humanly poſſible I can be ſo far out in the lady. (going)

MRS. FULMER.

Coxcomb! But hold—a thought occurs; as ſure as can be he has ſeen Miſs Dudley. A word with you, young gentleman; come back.

BELCOUR.

Well, what's your pleaſure?

MRS. FULMER.

You ſeem greatly captivated with this young lady; are you apt to fall in love thus at firſt ſight?

BELCOUR.

Oh, yes; 'tis the only way I ever can fall in love; any man may tumble into a pit by ſurprize, none but a fool would walk into one by choice.

MRS. FULMER.

You are a haſty lover it ſeems; have you ſpirit to be a generous one? They that will pleaſe the eye muſtn't ſpare the purſe.

BELCOUR.

Try me; put me to the proof; bring me to an interview with the dear girl that has thus captivated me, and ſee whether I have ſpirit to be grateful.

MRS. FULMER.

But how, pray, am I to know the girl you have ſet your heart on?

BELCOUR.

By an undeſcribable grace, that accompanies every look and action that falls from her: there can be but one ſuch woman in the world, and nobody can miſtake that one.

MRS. FULMER.

Well, if I ſhould ſtumble upon this angel in my walks, where am I to find you? What's your name?

BELCOUR.

Upon my ſoul, I can't tell you my name.

MRS. FULMER.

Not tell me! Why ſo?

BELCOUR.

Becauſe I don't know what it is myſelf; as yet I have no name.

MRS. FULMER.

No name!

BELCOUR.

None; a friend, indeed, lent me his; but he forbad me to uſe it on any unworthy occaſion.

MRS. FULMER.

But where is your place of abode?

BELCOUR.

I have none; I never ſlept a night in England in my life.

MRS. FULMER.

Hey-dey!

SCENE VI.

FULMER enters.

FULMER.

A fine caſe, truly, in a free country; a pretty paſs things are come to, if a man is to be aſſaulted in his own houſe.

MRS FULMER.

Who has aſſaulted you, my dear?

FULMER.

Who! why this Captain Drawcanſir, this old Dudley, my lodger; but I'll unlodge him; I'll unharbour him, I warrant.

MRS. FULMER.

Huſh! Huſh! Hold your tongue man; pocket the affront and be quiet; I've a ſcheme on foot will pay you for a hundred beatings. Why you ſurprize me, Mr. Fulmer; Captain Dudley aſſault you! Impoſſible.

FULMER.

Nay, I can't call it an abſolute aſſault; but he threatened me.

MRS. FULMER.

Oh, was that all? I thought how it would turn out—a likely thing, truly, for a perſon of his obliging compaſſionate turn: no, no, poor Captain Dudley, he has ſorrows and diſtreſſes enough of his own to employ his ſpirits, without ſetting them againſt other people. Make it up as faſt as you can: watch this gentleman out; follow him wherever he goes; and bring me word who and what he is; be ſure you don't loſe ſight of him; I've other buſineſs in hand. [Exit.

BELCOUR.

Pray, Sir, what ſorrows and diſtreſſes have befallen this old gentleman you ſpeak of?

FULMER.

Poverty, diſappointment, and all the diſtreſſes attendant thereupon: ſorrow enough of all conſcience: I ſoon found how it was with him by his way of living, low enough of all reaſon; but what I overheard this morning put it out of all doubt.

BELCOUR.

What did you overhear this morning?

FULMER.

Why, it ſeems he wants to join his regiment, and has been beating the town over to raiſe a little money for that purpoſe upon his pay; but the climate, I find, where he is going is ſo unhealthy, that nobody can be found to lend him any.

BELCOUR.

Why then your town is a damn'd good-for-nothing town; and I wiſh I had never come into it.

FULMER.

That's what I ſay, Sir; the hard-heartedneſs of ſome folks is unaccountable. There's an old Lady Ruſport, a near relation of this gentleman's; ſhe lives hard by here, oppoſite to Stockwell's, the great merchant; he ſent to her a begging, but to no purpoſe; though ſhe is as rich as a Jew, ſhe would not furniſh him with a farthing.

BELCOUR.

Is the Captain at home?

FULMER.

He is up ſtairs, Sir.

BELCOUR.

Will you take the trouble to deſire him to ſtep hither? I want to ſpeak to him.

FULMER.

I'll ſend him to you directly. I don't know what to make of this young man; but, if I live, I will find him out, or know the reaſon why. [Exit.

BELCOUR.

I've loſt the girl it ſeems; that's clear: ſhe was the firſt object of my purſuit; but the caſe of this poor officer touches me; and, after all, there may be as much true delight in reſcuing a fellow creature from diſtreſs, as there would be in plunging one into it——But let me ſee; its a point that muſt be managed with ſome delicacy—Apropos! there's pen and ink—I've ſtruck upon a method that will do (writes.) Ay, ay, this is the very thing; 'twas deviliſh lucky I happen'd to have theſe bills about me. There, there, fare you well; I'm glad to be rid of you; you ſtood a chance of being worſe applied, I can tell you. (encloſes and ſeals the paper.)

SCENE VII.

FULMER brings in DUDLEY.

FULMER.

That's the gentleman, Sir. I ſhall make bold, however, to lend an ear.

DUDLEY.

Have you any commands for me, Sir?

BELCOUR.

Your name is Dudley, Sir——?

DUDLEY.

It is.

BELCOUR.

You command a company, I think, Captain Dudley?

DUDLEY.

I did: I am now upon half-pay.

BELCOUR.

You've ſerved ſome time?

DUDLEY.

A pretty many years; long enough to ſee ſome people of more merit, and better intereſt than myſelf, made general officers.

BELCOUR.

Their merit I may have ſome doubt of; their intereſt I can readily give credit to; there is little promotion to be look'd for in your profeſſion, I believe, without friends, Captain?

DUDLEY.

I believe ſo too: have you any other buſineſs with me, may I aſk?

BELCOUR.

Your patience for a moment. I was informed you was about to join your regiment in diſtant quarters abroad.

DUDLEY.

I have been ſoliciting an exchange to a company on full-pay, quarter'd at James's-Fort, in Senegambia; but, I'm afraid, I muſt drop the undertaking.

BELCOUR.

Why ſo, pray?

DUDLEY.

Why ſo, Sir? 'Tis a home queſtion for a perfect ſtranger to put; there is ſomething very particular in all this.

BELCOUR.

If it is not impertinent, Sir, allow me to aſk you what reaſon you have for deſpairing of ſucceſs.

DUDLEY.

Why really, Sir, mine is an obvious reaſon for a ſoldier to have—Want of money; ſimply that.

BELCOUR.

May I beg to know the ſum you have occaſion for?

DUDLEY.

Truly, Sir, I cannot exactly tell you on a ſudden; nor is it, I ſuppoſe, of any great conſequence to you to be informed; but I ſhould gueſs, in the groſs, that two hundred pounds would ſerve.

BELCOUR.

And do you find a difficulty in raiſing that ſum upon your pay? 'Tis done every day.

DUDLEY.

The nature of the climate makes it difficult: I can get no one to inſure my life.

BELCOUR.

Oh! that's a circumſtance may make for you, as well as againſt: in ſhort, Captain Dudley, it ſo happens, that I can command the ſum of two hundred pounds: ſeek no farther; I'll accomodate you with it upon eaſy terms.

DUDLEY.

Sir! do I understand you rightly?—I beg your pardon; but am I to believe that you are in earnest?

BELCOUR.

What is your surprize? Is it an uncommon thing for a gentleman to speak truth; or is it incredible that one fellow creature should assist another?

DUDLEY.

I ask your pardon——May I beg to know to whom? Do you propose this in the way of business?

BELCOUR.

Entirely: I have no other business on earth.

DUDLEY.

Indeed! you are not a broker, I'm persuaded.

BELCOUR.

I am not.

DUDLEY.

Nor an army agent, I think?

BELCOUR.

I hope you will not think the worse of me for being neither; in short, Sir, if you will peruse this paper, it will explain to you who I am, and upon what terms I act; while you read it, I will step home, and fetch the money; and we will conclude the bargain without loss of time. In the mean while, good day to you. [Exit hastily.

DUDLEY.

Humph! there's something very odd in all this—let me see what we've got here——This paper is to tell me who he is, and what are his terms: in the name of wonder, why has he sealed it! Hey-dey! what's here? Two bank notes, of a hundred each! I can't comprehend what this means. Hold; here's a writing; perhaps that will show me. "Accept this trifle; pursue your fortune, and prosper."—Am I in a dream? Is this a reality?

SCENE VIII.

Enter MAJOR O'FLAHERTY,

MAJOR.

Save you, my dear! Is it you now that are Captain Dudley, I would ask?——Whuh! What's the hurry the man's in? If 'tis the lad that run out of the ſhop you wou'd overtake, you might as well ſtay where you are; by my ſoul, he's as nimble as a Croat, you are a full hour's march in his rear—Av, faith, you may as well turn back, and give over the purſuit; well, Captain Dudley, if that's your name, there's a letter for you. Read, man, read it; and I'll have a word with you, after you've done.

DUDLEY.

More miracles on foot! ſo, ſo, from Lady Ruſport.

O'FLAHERTY.

You're right, it is from her ladyſhip.

DUDLEY.

Well, Sir, I have caſt my eye over it; 'tis ſhort and peremptory; are you acquainted with the contents?

O'FLAHERTY.

Not at all; my dear, not at all.

DUDLEY.

Have you any meſſage from lady Ruſport?

O'FLAHERTY.

Not a ſyllable, honey; only when you've digeſted the letter, I've a little bit of a meſſage to deliver you from myſelf.

DUDLEY.

And may I beg to know who yourſelf is?

O'FLAHERTY.

Dennis O'Flaherty, at your ſervice; a poor major of grenadiers, nothing better.

DUDLEY.

So much for your name and title, Sir; now be ſo good to favour me with your meſſage.

O'FLAHERTY.

Why, then, Captain, I muſt tell you I have promiſed Lady Ruſport you ſhall do whatever it is ſhe bids you to do in that letter there.

DUDLEY.

Ay, indeed; have you undertaken ſo much Major, without knowing either what ſhe commands, or what I can perform?

O'FLAHERTY.

That's your concern, my dear, not mine; I muſt keep my word you know.

DUDLEY.

Or elſe, I ſuppoſe, you and I muſt meaſure ſwords?

O'FLAHERTY.

Upon my ſoul, you've hit it.

DUDLEY.

That wou'd hardly anſwer to either of us; you and I have, probably, had enough of fighting in our time before now.

O'FLAHERTY.

Faith and troth, Maſter Dudley, you may ſay that; 'tis thirty years, come the time, that I have followed the trade, and in a pretty many countries—Let me ſee—In the war before laſt I ſerv'd in the Iriſh Brigade, d'ye ſee; there after bringing off the French monarch, I left his ſervice, with a Britiſh bullet in my body, and this ribband in my button-hole. Laſt war I followed the fortunes of the German eagle, in the corps of grenadiers; there I had my belly-full of fighting, and a plentiful ſcarcity of every thing elſe. After ſix and twenty engagements, great and ſmall, I went off with this gaſh on my ſcull, and a kiſs of the empreſs queen's ſweet hand, (Heaven bleſs it) for my pains: ſince the peace, my dear, I took a little turn with the Confederates there in Poland—but ſuch another ſet of madcaps!—by the Lord Harry, I never knew what it was they were ſcuffling about.

DUDLEY.

Well, Major, I won't add another action to the liſt, you ſhall keep your promiſe with Lady Ruſport; ſhe requires me to leave London; I ſhall go in a few days, and you may take what credit you pleaſe from my compliance.

O'FLAHERTY.

Give me your hand, my dear boy, this will make her my own; when that's the caſe, we ſhall be brothers you know, and we'll ſhare her fortune between us.

DUDLEY.

Not ſo, Major; the man who marries Lady Ruſport will have a fair title to her whole fortune without diviſion.

But, I hope, your expectations of prevailing are founded upon good reaſons.

O'FLAHERTY.

Upon the beſt grounds in the world; firſt I think ſhe will comply, becauſe ſhe is a woman; ſecondly, I am perſuaded ſhe won't hold out long, becauſe ſhe's a widow; and thirdly, I make ſure of her, becauſe I've married five wives and never failed yet; and, for what I know, they're all alive and merry at this very hour.

DUDLEY.

Well, Sir, go on and proſper; if you can inſpire Lady Ruſport with half your charity, I ſhall think you deſerve all her fortune; at preſent, I muſt beg your excuſe: good morning to you.

O'FLAHERTY.

A good ſenſible man, and very much of a ſoldier; I did not care if I was better acquainted with him: but 'tis an awkward kind of a country for that; the Engliſh, I obſerve, are cloſe friends, but diſtant acquaintance. I ſuſpect the old lady has not been over generous to poor Dudley: I ſhall give her a little touch about that; upon my ſoul I know but one excuſe a perſon can have for giving nothing, and that is, like myſelf, having nothing to give. [Exit.

SCENE IX.

Scene changes to LADY RUSPORT'S Houſe.

A dreſſing-room.

MISS RUSPORT and LUCY.

CHARLOTTE.

Well, Lucy, you've diſlodged the old lady at laſt; but me thought you was a tedious time about it.

LUCY.

A tedious time indeed; I think they who have leaſt to ſpare, contrive to throw the moſt away; I thought I ſhou'd never have got her out of the houſe.

CHARLOTTE.

Why, ſhe's as deliberate in canvaſſing every article of her dreſs, as an ambaſſador wou'd be in ſettling the preliminaries of a treaty.

LUCY.

There was a new hood and handkerchief, that had come expreſs from Holborn-Hill on the occaſion, that took as much time in adjuſting ——

CHARLOTTE.

As they did in making, and ſhe was as vain of them, as an old maid of a young lover.

LUCY.

Or a young lover of himſelf. Then, madam, this being a viſit of great ceremony to a perſon of diſtinction, at the Weſt end of the town, the old ſtate chariot was drag'd forth on the occaſion, with ſtrict charges to dreſs out the box with the Leopard ſkin hammer-cloth.

CHARLOTTE.

Yes, and to hang the falſe tails on the miſerable ſtumps of the old crawling cattle. Well, well, pray Heaven the crazy affair don't break down again with her! at leaſt till ſhe gets to her journey's end.——but where's Charles Dudley? Run down, dear girl, and be ready to let him in; I think he's as long in coming, as ſhe was in going.

LUCY.

Why, indeed, madam, you ſeem the more alert of the two, I muſt ſay. [Exit.

CHARLOTTE.

Now the deuce take the girl for putting that notion into my head; I'm ſadly afraid Dudley does not like me; ſo much encouragement as I have given him to declare himſelf! I never cou'd get a word from him on the ſubject; this may be very honourable, but upon my life it's very provoking; by the way I wonder how I look to-day. Oh! ſhockingly, hideouſly pale! like a witch. This is the old lady's glaſs, and ſhe has left ſome of her wrinkles on it. How frightfully have I put on my cap, all awry! and my hair dreſt ſo unbecomingly! altogether I'm a moſt compleat fright.

SCENE X.

(CHARLES DUDLEY comes in unobserved.)

CHARLES.

That I deny.

CHARLOTTE.

Ah!

CHARLES.

Quarrelling with your glass, cousin? Make it up; make it up and be friends; it cannot compliment you more, than by reflecting you, as you are.

CHARLOTTE.

Well, I vow, my dear Charles, that is delightfully said, and deserves my very best curtesy: your flattery, like a rich jewel, has a value not only from its superior lustre, but from its extraordinary scarceness: I verily think this is the only civil speech you ever directed to my person in your life.

CHARLES.

And I ought to ask pardon of your good sense, for having done it now.

CHARLOTTE.

Nay, now you relapse again: don't you know if you keep well with a woman on the great score of beauty, she'll never quarrel with you on the trifling article of good sense? But any thing serves to fill up a dull yawning hour with an insipid cousin; you have brighter moments, and warmer spirits for the dear girl of your heart.

CHARLES.

Oh! fie upon you, fie upon you.

CHARLOTTE.

You blush, and the reason is apparent, you are a novice at hypocrisy; but no practice can make a visit of ceremony pass for a visit of choice: love is ever before its time, friendship is apt to lag a little after it: pray, Charles, did you make any extraordinary haste hither?

CHARLES.

By your question, I see you acquit me of the impertinence of being in love.

CHARLOTTE.

But why impertinence? why the impertinence of being in love? you have one language for me, Charles, and another for the woman of your affection.

CHARLES.

You are mistaken; the woman of my affection shall never hear any other language from me, than what I use to you.

CHARLOTTE.

I am afraid, then, you'll never make yourself understood by her.

CHARLES.

It is not fit I shou'd; there is no need of love to make me miserable; 'tis wretchedness enough to be a beggar.

CHARLOTTE.

A beggar do you call yourself! O Charles, Charles, rich in every merit and accomplishment, whom may you not aspire to? and why think you so unworthily of our sex, as to conclude there is not one to be found with sense to discern your virtue and generosity to reward it?

CHARLES.

You distress me, I must beg to hear no more.

CHARLOTTE.

Well, I can be silent——Thus does he always serve me, whenever I am about to disclose myself to him.

CHARLES.

Why do you not banish me and my misfortunes for ever from your thoughts?

CHARLOTTE.

Ay, wherefore do I not? since you never allowed me a place in yours: but go, Sir, I have no right to stay you; go where your heart directs you, go to the happy, the distinguished fair one.

CHARLES.

Now, by all that's good, you do me wrong: there is no such fair one for me to go to, nor have I an acquaintance amongst the sex, yourself excepted, which answers to that description.

CHARLOTTE.

Indeed!

CHARLES.

In very truth; there then let us drop the ſubject. May you be happy though I never can!

CHARLOTTE.

O, Charles, give me your hand; if I have offended you, I aſk you pardon; you have been long acquainted with my temper, and know how to bear with its infirmities.

CHARLES.

Thus, my dear Charlotte, let us ſeal our reconciliation (kiſſing her hand.) Bear with thy infirmities! By Heaven, I know not any one failing in thy whole compoſition, except that of too great a partiality for an undeſerving man.

CHARLOTTE.

And you are now taking the very courſe to augment that failing. A thought ſtrikes me: I have a commiſſion that you muſt abſolutely execute for me; I have immediate occaſion for the ſum of two hundred pounds; you know my fortune is ſhut up till I am of age: take this paltry box; it contains my ear-rings, and ſome other bawbles I have no uſe for; carry it to our oppoſite neighbour, Mr. Stockwell; I don't know where elſe to apply; leave it as a depoſit in his hands, and beg him to accomodate me with the ſum.

CHARLES.

Dear Charlotte, what are you about to do? How can you poſſibly want two hundred pounds?

CHARLOTTE.

How can I poſſibly do without it, you mean? Doesn't every lady want two hundred pounds? Perhaps I have loſt it at play; perhaps I mean to win as much to it; perhaps I want it for two hundred different uſes.

CHARLES.

Pooh! pooh! all this is nothing; don't I know you never play?

CHARLOTTE.

You miſtake; I have a ſpirit to ſet not only this trifle, but my whole fortune upon a ſtake; therefore make no wry faces, but do as I bid you: you will find Mr. Stockwell a very honourable gentleman.

LUCY enters in haſte.

LUCY.

Dear Madam, as I live, here comes the old lady in a hackney-coach.

CHARLOTTE.

The old chariot has given her a ſecond tumble: away with you; you know your way out without meeting her; take the box, and do as I deſire you.

CHARLES.

I muſt not diſpute your orders. Farewell!

[Exeunt CHARLES and CHARLOTTE.

SCENE XI.

LADY RUSPORT enters, leaning on MAJOR O'FLAHERTY'S arm.

O'FLAHERTY.

Reſt yourſelf upon my arm; never ſpare it; 'tis ſtrong enough: it has ſtood harder ſervice than you can put it to.

LUCY.

Mercy upon me, what is the matter; I am frighten'd out of my wits; has your ladyſhip had an accident?

LADY RUSPORT.

O Lucy! the moſt untoward one in nature; I know not how I ſhall repair it.

O'FLAHERTY.

Never go about to repair it, my lady; ey'n build a new one; 'twas but a crazy piece of buſineſs at beſt.

LUCY.

Bleſs me, is the old chariot broke down with you again?

LADY RUSPORT.

Broke, child? I don't know what might have been broke, if, by great good fortune, this obliging gentleman had not been at hand to aſſiſt me.

LUCY.

Dear Madam, let me run and fetch you a cup of the cordial drops.

LADY RUSPORT.

Do, Lucy. Alas! Sir, ever ſince I loſt my huſband, my poor nerves have been ſhook to pieces; there hangs his beloved picture; that precious relick, and a plentiful jointure, is all that remains to conſole me for the beſt of men.

O'FLAHERTY.

Let me ſee; i'faith a comely perſonage: by his fur cloak I ſuppoſe he was in the Ruſſian ſervice, and by the gold chain round his neck I ſhould gueſs he had been honoured with the order of St. Catharine.

LADY RUSPORT.

No, no; he meddled with no St Catharines: that's the habit he wore in his mayoralty; Sir Stephen was Lord Mayor of London; but he is gone, and has left me a poor, weak, ſolitary widow behind him.

O'FLAHERTY.

By all means, then, take a ſtrong, able, hearty man to repair his loſs: if ſuch a plain fellow as one Dennis O'Flaherty can pleaſe you, I think I may venture to ſay, without any diſparagement to the gentleman in the fur-gown there——

LADY RUSPORT.

What are you going to ſay? Don't ſhock my ears with any compariſons, I deſire.

O'FLAHERTY.

Not I, by my ſoul; I don't believe there's any compariſon in the caſe.

LADY RUSPORT.

Oh, are you come? Give me the drops; I'm all in a flutter.

O'FLAHERTY.

Hark'e, ſweetheart, what are thoſe ſame drops? Have you any more left in the bottle? I didn't care if I took a little ſip of them myſelf.

LUCY.

Oh! Sir, they are call'd the cordial reſtorative elixir, or the nervous golden drops; they are only for ladies' caſes.

O'FLAHERTY.

Yes, yes, my dear, there are gentlemen as well as ladies that ſtand in need of thoſe ſame golden drops; they'd ſuit my caſe to a tittle.

LADY RUSPORT.

Well, Major, did you give old Dudley my letter, and will the ſilly man do as I bid him, and be gone?

O'FLAHERTY.

You are obey'd; he's on his march.

LADY RUSPORT.

That's well; you have manag'd this matter to perfection; I didn't think he would have been ſo eaſily prevail'd upon.

O'FLAHERTY.

At the firſt word; no difficulty in life; 'twas the very thing he was determin'd to do, before I came; I never met a more obliging gentleman.

LADY RUSPORT.

Well, 'tis no matter; ſo I am but rid of him, and his diſtreſſes: wou'd you believe it, Major O'Flaherty, it was but this morning he ſent a begging to me for money to fit him out upon ſome wild-goose expedition to the coaſt of Africa, I know not where.

O'FLAHERTY.

Well, you ſent him what he wanted?

LADY RUSPORT.

I ſent him, what he deſerved, a flat refuſal.

O'FLAHERTY.

You refuſed him!

LADY RUSPORT.

Moſt undoubtedly.

O'FLAHERTY.

You ſent him nothing!

LADY RUSPORT.

Not a ſhilling.

O'FLAHERTY.

Good morning to you—Your ſervant—(going.)

LADY RUSPORT.

Heyday! What ails the man? Where are you going?

O'FLAHERTY.

Out of your houſe, before the roof falls on my head—to poor Dudley, to ſhare the little modicum that thirty years hard ſervice has left me; I wiſh it was more for his ſake.

LADY RUSPORT.

Very well, Sir; take your courſe; I ſhan't attempt to ſtop you; I ſhall ſurvive it; it will not break my heart if I never ſee you more.

O'FLAHERTY.

Break your heart! No, o' my conſcience will it not.—You preach, and you pray, and you turn up your eyes, and all the while you're as hard-hearted as a hyena—A hyena, truly! By my ſoul there isn't in the whole creation ſo ſavage an animal as a human creature without pity. Exit.

LADY RUSPORT.

A hyena, truly! Where did the fellow blunder upon that word? Now the deuce take him for uſing it, and the Macaronies for inventing it.

END OF THE SECOND ACT.

ACT III. SCENE I.

(A room in STOCKWELL'S house.)

STOCKWELL and BELCOUR.

STOCKWELL.

Gratify me ſo far, however, Mr. Belcour, as to ſee Miſs Ruſport; carry her the ſum ſhe wants, and return the poor girl her box of diamonds, which Dudley left in my hands; you know what to ſay on the occaſion better than I do; that part of your commiſſion I leave to your own diſcretion, and you may ſeaſon it with what galantry you think fit.

BELCOUR.

You cou'd not have pitch'd upon a greater bungler at galantry than myſelf, if you had rummag'd every company in the city, and the whole court of aldermen into the bargain; part of your errand, however, I will do; but whether it ſhall be with an ill grace, or a good one, depends upon the caprice of a moment, the humour of the lady, the mode of our meeting, and a thouſand undefinable ſmall circumſtances that nevertheleſs determine us upon all the great occaſions of life.

STOCKWELL.

I perſuade myſelf you will find Miſs Ruſport an ingenuous, worthy, animated girl.

BELCOUR.

Why I like her the better, as a woman; but name her not to me, as a wife! No, if ever I marry, it muſt be a ſtaid, ſober, conſiderate damſel, with blood in her veins as cold as a turtle's; quick of ſcent as a vultur when danger's in the wind, wary and ſharp-ſighted as a hawk when treachery is on foot: with ſuch a companion at my elbow, for ever whiſpering in my ear—have a care of this man, he's a cheat; don't go near that woman, ſhe's a jilt; over head there's a ſcaffold, under foot there's a well; Oh! Sir, ſuch a woman might lead me up and down this great city without difficulty or danger; but with a girl of Miſs Ruſport's complection, heaven and earth! Sir, we ſhou'd be dup'd, undone, and diſtracted, in a fortnight.

STOCKWELL.

Ha! ha! ha! Why you are become wondrous circumſpect of a ſudden, pupil; and if you can find ſuch a prudent damſel as you deſcribe, you have my conſent—only beware how you chuſe; diſcretion is not the reigning quality amongſt the fine ladies of the preſent time; and I think in Miſs Ruſport's particular I have given you no bad counſel.

BELCOUR.

Well, well, if you'll fetch me the jewels, I believe I can undertake to carry them to her; but as for the money, I'll have nothing to do with that; Dudley would be your fitteſt ambaſſador on that occaſion; and, if I miſtake not, the moſt agreeable to the lady.

STOCKWELL.

Why, indeed, from what I know of the matter, it may not improbably be deſtined to find its way into his pockets. [Exit.

BELCOUR.

Then depend upon it theſe are not the only trinkets ſhe means to dedicate to Captain Dudley. As for me, Stockwell indeed wants me to marry; but till I can get this bewitching girl, this incognita, out of my head, I can never think of any other woman.

(SERVANT enters, and delivers a letter).

Heyday! Where can I have pick'd up a correſpondent already? 'Tis a moſt execrable manuſcript—Let me ſee—Martha Fulmer—Who is Martha Fulmer? Pſhaw! I won't be at the trouble of decyphering her damn'd pot-hooks. Hold, hold, hold; What have we got here?

"DEAR SIR,

"I've diſcover'd the lady you was ſo "much ſmitten with, and can procure you an interview "with her; if you can be as generous to a pretty girl as "you was to a paltry old captain," (How did ſhe find that out?) "you need not deſpair: come to me immediately; "the lady is now in my houſe, and expects you.

"Yours,

"MARTHA FULMER."

O thou dear, lovely, and enchanting paper, which I was about to tear into a thouſand ſcraps, devoutly I entreat thy pardon: I have ſlighted thy contents, which are delicious; ſlander'd thy characters, which are divine; and all the atonement I can make is implicitly to obey thy mandates.

STOCKWELL returns.

STOCKWELL.

Mr. Belcour, here are the jewels; this letter encloſes bills for the money; and, if you will deliver it to Miſs Ruſport, you'll have no farther trouble on that ſcore.

BELCOUR.

Ah, Sir! the letter which I've been reading diſqualifies me for delivering the letter which you have been writing: I have other game on foot; the loveliеſt girl my eyes ever feaſted upon is ſtarted in view, and the world cannot now divert me from purſuing her.

STOCKWELL.

Hey-dey! What has turned you thus on a ſudden?

BELCOUR.

A woman: one that can turn, and overturn me and my tottering reſolutions every way ſhe will. Oh, Sir, if this is folly in me, you muſt rail at Nature: you muſt chide the ſun, that was vertical at my birth, and would not wink upon my nakedneſs, but ſwaddled me in the broadeſt, hotteſt glare of his meridian beams.

STOCKWELL.

Mere rhapſody; mere childiſh rhapſody; the libertine's familiar plea——Nature made us, 'tis true, but we are the reſponſible creators of our own faults and follies.

BELCOUR.

Sir!

STOCKWELL.

Slave of every face you meet, ſome huſſey has inveigled you, ſome handſome profligate, (the town is full of them;) and, when once fairly bankrupt in conſtitution, as well as fortune, nature no longer ſerves as your excuſe for being vicious, neceſſity, perhaps, will ſtand your friend, and you'll reform.

BELCOUR.

You are ſevere.

STOCKWELL.

It fits me to be ſo—it well becomes a father——I would ſay a friend—How ſtrangely I forget myſelf—How difficult it is to counterfeit indifference, and put a maſk upon the heart—I've ſtruck him hard; he reddens.

BELCOUR.

How could you tempt me ſo? Had you not inadvertently dropped the name of father, I fear our friendſhip, ſhort as it has been, would ſcarce have held me—But even your miſtake I reverence—Give me your hand—'tis over.

STOCKWELL.

Generous young man——let me embrace you——How ſhall I hide my tears? I have been to blame; becauſe I bore you the affection of a father, I raſhly took up the authority of one. I aſk your pardon—purſue your courſe; I have no right to ſtop it——What would you have me do with theſe things?

BELCOUR.

This, if I might adviſe; carry the money to Miſs Ruſport immediately; never let generoſity wait for it's materials; that part of the buſineſs preſſes. Give me the jewels; I'll find an opportunity of delivering them into her hands; and your viſit may pave the way for my reception. [Exit.

STOCKWELL.

Be it ſo: good morning to you. Farewel advice! Away goes he upon the wing for pleaſure. What various paſſions he awakens in me! He pains, yet pleaſes me; affrights, offends, yet grows upon my heart. His very failings ſet him off—for ever treſpaſſing, for ever atoning, I almoſt think he would not be ſo perfect, were he free from fault: I muſt diſſemble longer; and yet how painful the experiment!—Even now he's gone upon ſome wild adventure; and who can tell what miſchief may befal him! O Nature, what it is to be a father! Juſt ſuch a thoughtleſs headlong thing was I, when I beguiled his mother into love. [Exit.

SCENE II.

Scene changes to FULMER'S House.

FULMER and his WIFE.

FULMER.

I tell you, Patty, you are a fool to think of bringing him and Miſs Dudley together; 'twill ruin every thing, and blow your whole ſcheme up to the moon at once.

MRS. FULMER.

Why, ſure, Mr. Fulmer, I may be allowed to rear a chicken of my own hatching, as they ſay. Who firſt ſprung the thought but I, pray? Who contrived the plot? Who propoſed the letter, but I, I?

FULMER.

And who dogg'd the gentleman home? Who found out his name, fortune, connection, that he was a Weſt-Indian, freſh landed, and full of caſh; a gull to our heart's content; a hot-brain'd headlong ſpark, that would run into our trap, like a wheat-ear under a turf?

MRS. FULMER.

Hark! he's come: diſappear, march; and leave the field open to my machinations. [Exit FULMER.

SCENE III.

BELCOUR enters to her.

BELCOUR.

O, thou dear miniſter to my happineſs, let me embrace thee! Why thou art my polar ſtar, my propitious conſtellation, by which I navigate my impatient bark into the port of pleaſure and delight.

MRS. FULMER.

Oh, you men are fly creatures! Do you remember now, you cruel, what you ſaid to me this morning?

BELCOUR.

All a jeſt, a frolick; never think on't; bury it for ever in oblivion; thou! why thou art all over nectar and ambroſia, powder of pearl and odour of roſes; thou haſt the youth of Hebe, the beauty of Venus, and the pen of Sappho; but in the name of all that's lovely, where's the lady? I expected to find her with you.

MRS. FULMER.

No doubt you did, and theſe raptures were deſigned for her, but where have you loitered? the lady's gone, you are too late; girls of her ſort are not to be kept waiting like negro ſlaves in your ſugar plantations.

BELCOUR.

Gone; whither is ſhe gone? tell me that I may follow her.

MRS. FULMER.

Hold, hold, not ſo faſt young gentleman, this is a caſe of ſome delicacy; ſhou'd Captain Dudley know that I introduced you to his daughter, he is a man of ſuch ſcrupulous honour——

BELCOUR.

What do you tell me! is ſhe daughter to the old gentleman I met here this morning?

MRS. FULMER.

The ſame; him you was ſo generous to.

BELCOUR.

There's an end of the matter then at once; it ſhall never be ſaid of me, that I took advantage of the father's neceſſities to trepan the daughter (going).

MRS. FULMER.

So, ſo, I've made a wrong caſt, he's one of your conſcientious ſinners I find, but I won't loſe him thus—— Ha! ha! ha!

BELCOUR.

What is it you laugh at?

MRS. FULMER.

Your abſolute inexperience: have you lived ſo very little time in this country, as not to know that between young people of equal ages, the term of ſiſter often is a cover for that of miſtreſs? This young lady is, in that ſenſe of the word, ſiſter to young Dudley, and conſequently daughter to my old lodger.

BELCOUR.

Indeed! are you ſerious?

MRS. FULMER.

Can you doubt it? I muſt have been pretty well aſſur'd of that before I invited you hither.

BELCOUR.

That's true; ſhe cannot be a woman of honour, and Dudley is an unconſcionable young rogue to think of keeping one fine girl in pay, by raiſing contributions on another; he ſhall therefore give her up; ſhe is a dear, bewitching, miſchievous, little devil; and he ſhall poſitively give her up.

MRS. FULMER.

Ay, now the freak has taken you again; I ſay give her up; there's one way, indeed, and certain of ſucceſs.

BELCOUR.

What's that?

MRS. FULMER.

Out-bid him, never dream of out-bluſtring him; buy out his leaſe of poſſeſſion, and leave her to manage his ejectment.

BELCOUR.

Is ſhe ſo venal? Never fear me then; when beauty is the purchaſe, I ſhan't think much of the price.

MRS. FULMER.

All things, then, will be made eaſy enough; let me ſee; ſome little genteel preſent to begin with: what have you got about you? Ay, ſearch; I can beſtow it to advantage, there's no time to be loſt.

BELCOUR.

Hang it, confound it; a plague upon't, ſay I! I hav'n't a guinea left in my pocket; I parted from my whole ſtock here this morning, and have forgot to ſupply myſelf ſince.

MRS. FULMER.

Mighty well; let it paſs then; there's an end; think no more of the lady, that's all.

BELCOUR.

Diſtraction! think no more of her? let me only ſtep home and provide myſelf, I'll be back with you in an inſtant.

MRS. FULMER.

Pooh, pooh! that's a wretched ſhift: have you nothing of value about you? money's a coarſe ſlovenly vehicle, fit only to bribe electors in a borough; there are more graceful ways of purchaſing a lady's favours; rings, trinkets, jewels!

BELCOUR.

Jewels! Gadſo, I proteſt I had forgot; I have a caſe of jewels; but they won't do, I muſt not part from them; no, no, they are appropriated; they are none of my own.

MRS. FULMER.

Let me ſee, let me ſee! Ay, now, this were ſomething-like: pretty creatures, how they ſparkle! theſe wou'd enſure ſucceſs.

BELCOUR.

Indeed!

MRS. FULMER.

Theſe wou'd make her your own for ever.

BELCOUR.

Then the deuce take 'em for belonging to another perſon; I cou'd find in my heart to give 'em the girl, and ſwear I've loſt them.

MRS. FULMER.

Ay, do, ſay they were ſtolen out of your pocket.

BELCOUR.

No, hang it, that's diſhonourable; here, give me the paltry things, I'll write you an order on my merchant for double their value.

MRS. FULMER.

An order! No; order for me no orders upon merchants, with their value received, and three days grace; their noting, proteſting, and endorſing, and all their counting-houſe formalities; I'll have nothing to do with them; leave your diamonds with me, and give your order for the value of them to the owner: the money would be as good as the trinkets, I warrant you.

BELCOUR.

Hey! how! I never thought of that; but a breach of truſt; 'tis impoſſible; I never can conſent, therefore, give me the jewels back again.

MRS. FULMER.

Take 'em; I am now to tell you the lady is in this houſe.

BELCOUR.

In this houſe?

MRS. FULMER.

Yes, Sir, in this very houſe; but what of that? you have got what you like better; your toys, your trinkets, go, go: Oh! you're a man of a notable ſpirit, are you not?

BELCOUR.

Provoking creature! Bring me to the ſight of the dear girl, and diſpoſe of me as you think fit.

MRS. FULMER.

And of the diamonds too?

BELCOUR.

Damn 'em, I wou'd there was not ſuch a bauble in nature! But come, come, diſpatch; if I had the throne of Dehli I ſhould give it to her.

MRS. FULMER.

Swear to me then that you will keep within bounds, remember ſhe paſſes for the ſiſter of young Dudley. Oh! if you come to your flights, and your rhapſodies, ſhe'll be off in an inſtant.

BELCOUR.

Never fear me.

MRS. FULMER.

You muſt expect to hear her talk of her father, as ſhe calls him, and her brother, and your bounty to her family.

BELCOUR.

Ay, ay, never mind what ſhe talks of, only bring her.

MRS. FULMER.

You'll be prepar'd upon that head.

BELCOUR.

I ſhall be prepar'd, never fear; away with you.

MRS. FULMER.

But hold, I had forgot: not a word of the diamonds; leave that matter to my management.

BELCOUR.

Hell and vexation! Get out of the room, or I ſhall run diſtracted. [Exit Mrs. Fulmer.] Of a certain, Belcour, thou art born to be the fool of woman: ſure no man ſins with ſo much repentance, or repents with ſo little amendment, as I do. I cannot give away another perſon's property, honour forbids me; and I poſitively cannot give up the girl; love, paſſion, conſtitution, every thing proteſts againſt that. How ſhall I decide? I cannot bring myſelf to break a truſt, and I am not at preſent in the humour to baulk my inclinations. Is there no middle way? Let me conſider—There is, there is: my good genius has preſented me with one; apt, obvious, honourable: the girl ſhall not go without her baubles, I'll not go without the girl, Miſs Ruſport ſhan't loſe her diamonds, I'll ſave Dudley from deſtruction, and every party ſhall be a gainer by the project.

SCENE IV.

MRS. FULMER introducing MISS DUDLEY.

MRS. FULMER.

Miſs Dudley, this is the worthy gentleman you with to ſee; this is Mr. Belcour.

LOUISA.

As I live, the very man that beſet me in the ſtreets. (aſide.)

BELCOUR.

An angel, by this light! Oh I am gone paſt all retrieving! (aſide.)

LOUISA.

Mrs. Fulmer, Sir, informs me you are the gentleman from whom my father has received ſuch civilities.

BELCOUR.

Oh! never name 'em.

LOUISA.

Pardon me, Mr. Belcour, they muſt be both named and remember'd; and if my father was here——

BELCOUR.

I am much better pleaſed with his repreſentative.

LOUISA.

That title is my brother's, Sir; I have no claim to it.

BELCOUR.

I believe it.

LOUISA.

But as neither he nor my father were fortunate enough to be at home, I could not resist the opportunity——

BELCOUR.

Nor I neither, by my soul, Madam; let us improve it, therefore. I am in love with you to distraction; I was charmed at the first glance; I attempted to accost you; you fled; I follow'd; but was defeated of an interview; at length I have obtain'd one, and seize the opportunity of casting my person and my fortune at your feet.

LOUISA.

You astonish me! Are you in your senses, or do you make a jest of my misfortunes? Do you ground pretences on your generosity, or do you make a practice of this folly with every woman you meet?

BELCOUR.

Upon my life, no: As you are the handsomest woman I ever met, so you are the first to whom I ever made the like professions: as for my generosity, Madam, I must refer you on that score to this good lady, who I believe has something to offer in my behalf.

LOUISA.

Don't build upon that, Sir; I must have better proofs of your generosity, than the mere divestment of a little superfluous dross, before I can credit the sincerity of professions so abruptly deliver'd. [Exit hastily.

BELCOUR.

Oh! ye Gods and Goddesses, how her anger animates her beauty! [Going out.

MRS. FULMER.

Stay, Sir; if you stir a step after her, I renounce your interest for ever: why you'll ruin every thing.

BELCOUR.

Well, I must have her, cost what it will: I see she understands her own value tho'; a little superfluous dross, truly! She must have better proofs of my generosity.

MRS. FULMER.

'Tis exactly as I told you; your money she calls dross; she's too proud to stain her fingers with your coin; bait your hook well with jewels; try that experiment, and she's your own.

BELCOUR.

Take 'em; let 'em go; lay 'em at her feet; I must get out of the scrape as I can; my propensity is irresistible: there! you have 'em; they are yours; they are her's; but remember they are a trust; I commit them to her keeping till I can buy 'em off with something she shall think more valuable; now tell me when shall I meet her?

MRS. FULMER.

How can I tell that? Don't you see what an alarm you have put her into? Oh! you are a rare one! But go your ways for this while; leave her to my management, and come to me at seven this evening; but remember not to bring empty pockets with you——Ha! ha! ha!

[Exeunt severally.

SCENE V.

LADY RUSPORT's House.

MISS RUSPORT enters, followed by a servant.

CHARLOTTE.

Desire Mr. Stockwell to walk in. [Exit Servant.

STOCKWELL enters.

STOCWELL.

Madam, your most obedient servant; I am honoured with your commands, by Captain Dudley; and have brought the money with me as you directed; I understand the sum you have occasion for is two hundred pounds.

CHARLOTTE.

It is, Sir; I am quite confounded at your taking this trouble upon yourself, Mr. Stockwell.

STOCKWELL.

There is a Bank-note, Madam, to the amount: your jewels are in safe hands, and will be delivered to you directly. If I had been happy in being better known to you, I ſhould have hoped you would not have thought it neceſſary to place a depoſit in my hands for ſo trifling a ſum as you have now required me to ſupply you with.

CHARLOTTE.

The bawbles I ſent you may very well be ſpared; and, as they are the only ſecurity, in my preſent ſituation, I can give you, I could wiſh you would retain them in your hands: when I am of age, (which, if I live a few months, I ſhall be) I will replace your favour, with thanks.

STOCKWELL.

It is obvious, Miſs Ruſport, that your charms will ſuffer no impeachment by the abſence of theſe ſuperficial ornaments; but they ſhould be ſeen in the ſuite of a woman of faſhion, not as creditors to whom you are indebted for your appearance, but as ſubſervient attendants, which help to make up your equipage.

CHARLOTTE.

Mr. Stockwell is determined not to wrong the confidence I repoſed in his politeneſs.

STOCKWELL.

I have only to requeſt, Madam, that you will allow Mr. Belcour, a young gentleman, in whoſe happineſs I particularly intereſt myſelf, to have the honour of delivering you the box of jewels.

CHARLOTTE.

Moſt gladly; any friend of yours cannot fail of being welcome here.

STOCKWELL.

I flatter myſelf you will not find him totally undeſerving your good opinion; an education, not of the ſtricteſt kind, and ſtrong animal ſpirits, are apt ſometimes to betray him into youthful irregularities; but an high principle of honour, and an uncommon benevolence, in the eye of candor, will, I hope, atone for any faults, by which theſe good qualities are not impaired.

CHARLOTTE.

I dare ſay Mr. Belcour's behaviour wants no apology: we've no right to be over ſtrict in canvaſſing the morals of a common acquaintance.

STOCKWELL.

I wiſh it may be my happineſs to ſee Mr. Belcour in the liſt, not of your common, but particular acquaintance, of your friends, Miſs Ruſport—I dare not be more explicit.

CHARLOTTE.

Nor need you, Mr. Stockwell: I ſhall be ſtudious to deſerve his friendſhip; and, though I have long ſince unalterably placed my affections on another, I truſt, I have not left myſelf inſenſible to the merits of Mr. Belcour; and hope that neither you nor he will, for that reaſon, think me leſs worthy your good opinion and regards.

STOCKWELL.

Miſs Ruſport, I ſincerely wiſh you happy: I have no doubt you have placed your affection on a deſerving man; and I have no right to combat your choice. [Exit.

CHARLOTTE.

How honourable is that behaviour! Now, if Charles was here, I ſhould be happy. The old lady is ſo fond of her new Iriſh acquaintance, that I have the whole houſe at my diſpoſal. [Exit CHARLOTTE.

SCENE VI.

BELCOUR enters, preceded by a Servant.

SERVANT.

I aſk your honour's pardon; I thought my young lady was here; who ſhall I inform her wou'd ſpeak to her?

BELCOUR.

Belcour is my name, Sir; and pray beg your lady to put herſelf in no hurry on my account; for I'd ſooner ſee the devil than ſee her face (Exit Servant.) In the name of all that's miſchievous, why did Stockwell drive me hither in ſuch haſte? A pretty figure, truly, I ſhall make: an ambaſſador without credentials. Blockhead that I was to charge myſelf with her diamonds; officious, meddling puppy! Now they are irretrievably gone: that ſuſpicious jade Fulmer wouldn't part even with a ſight of them, tho' I would have ranſom'd 'em at twice their value. Now muſt I truſt to my poor wits to bring me off: a lamentable dependance. Fortune be my helper! Here comes the girl—If ſhe is noble minded, as ſhe is ſaid to be, ſhe will forgive me; if not, 'tis a loſt cauſe; for I have not thought of one word in my excuſe.

SCENE VII.

CHARLOTTE enters.

CHARLOTTE.

Mr. Belcour, I'm proud to ſee you: your friend, Mr. Stockwell, prepared me to expect this honour; and I am happy in the opportunity of being known to you.

BELCOUR.

A fine girl, by my ſoul! Now what a curſed hang-dog do I look like! (aſide.)

CHARLOTTE.

You are newly arrived in this country, Sir?

BELCOUR.

Juſt landed, Madam; juſt ſet a-ſhore, with a large cargo of Muſcovado ſugars, rum-puncheons, mahogany-ſlabs, wet ſweet-meats, and green paroquets.

CHARLOTTE.

May I aſk you how you like London, Sir?

BELCOUR.

To admiration: I think the town and the town's-folk are exactly ſuited; 'tis a great, rich, overgrown, noiſy, tumultuous place: the whole morning is a buſtle to get money, and the whole afternoon is a hurry to ſpend it.

CHARLOTTE.

Are theſe all the obſervations you have made?

BELCOUR.

No, Madam; I have obſerved the women are very captivating, and the men very ſoon caught.

CHARLOTTE.

Ay, indeed! Whence do you draw that concluſion?

BELCOUR.

From infallible guides; the firſt remark I collect from what I now ſee, the ſecond from what I now feel.

CHARLOTTE.

Oh, the deuce take you! but to wave this ſubject; I believe, Sir, this was a viſit of buſineſs, not compliment; was it not?

BELCOUR.

Ay; now comes on my execution.

CHARLOTTE.

You have ſome fooliſh trinkets of mine, Mr. Belcour; havn't you?

BELCOUR.

No, in truth; they are gone in ſearch of a trinket, ſtill more fooliſh than themſelves (aſide.)

CHARLOTTE.

Some diamonds I mean, Sir; Mr. Stockwell inform'd me you was charged with 'em.

BELCOUR.

Oh, yes, Madam; but I have the moſt treacherous memory in life—Here they are! Pray put them up; they're all right; you need not examine 'em (gives a box.)

CHARLOTTE.

Hey-dey! right, Sir! Why theſe are not my diamonds; theſe are quite different; and, as it ſhould ſeem, of much greater value.

BELCOUR.

Upon my life I'm glad on't; for then I hope you value 'em more than your own.

CHARLOTTE.

As a purchaſer I ſhould, but not as an owner; you miſtake, theſe belong to ſomebody elſe.

BELCOUR.

'Tis yours, I'm afraid, that belong to ſomebody elſe.

CHARLOTTE.

What is it you mean? I muſt inſiſt upon your taking 'em back again.

BELCOUR.

Pray, madam, don't do that; I ſhall infallibly loſe them; I have the worſt luck with diamonds of any man living.

CHARLOTTE.

That you might well ſay, was you to give me theſe in the place of mine; but pray, Sir, what is the reaſon of all this? Why have you changed the jewels? and where have you diſpoſed of mine?

BELCOUR.

Miſs Ruſport, I cannot invent a lie for my life; and, if it was to ſave it, I coudn't tell one: I am an idle, diſſipated, unthinking fellow, not worth your notice; in ſhort, I am a Weſt-Indian; and you muſt try me according to the charter of my colony, not by a jury of English spinsters: truth is, I've given away your jewels; caught with a pair of sparkling eyes, whose lustre blinded their's, I served your property, as I shou'd my own, and lavish'd it away; let me not totally despair of your forgiveness: I frequently do wrong, but never with impunity: if your displeasure is added to my own, my punishment will be too severe. When I parted from the jewels, I had not the honour of knowing their owner.

CHARLOTTE.

Mr. Belcour, your sincerity charms me, I enter at once into your character, and I make all the allowances for it you can desire. I take your jewels for the present, because I know there is no other way of reconciling you to yourself; but If I give way to your spirit in one point, you must yield to mine in another; remember I will not keep more than the value of my own jewels: there is no need to be pillaged by more than one woman at a time, Sir.

BELCOUR.

Now may every blessing that can crown your virtues, and reward your beauty, be shower'd upon you; may you meet admiration without envy, love without jealousy: and old age without malady! may the man of your heart be ever constant, and you never meet a less penitent, or less grateful offender than myself.

(Servant enters and delivers a letter.)

CHARLOTTE.

Does your letter require such haste?

SERVANT.

I was bade to give it into your own hands, madam.

CHARLOTTE.

From Charles Dudley, I see—have I your permission? Good Heaven, what do I read! Mr. Belcour you are concern'd in this——"Dear Charlotte; in the midst "of our distress, Providence has cast a benefactor in our "way, after the most unexpected manner: a young West "Indian, rich, and with a warmth of heart peculiar to "his climate, has rescued my father from his troubles, "satisfied his wants, and enabled him to accomplish his "exchange: when I relate to you the manner in which " this was done, you will be charm'd; I can only now " add, that it was by chance we found out that his " name is Belcour, and that he is a friend of Mr. Stock- " well's. I loſe not a moment's time in making you ac- " quainted with this fortunate event for reaſons which " delicacy obliges me to ſuppreſs; but, perhaps, if you " have not received the money on your jewels, you will " not think it neceſſary now to do it. I have the honour " to be,

" Dear Madam,

" moſt faithfully yours,

" CHARLES DUDLEY."

Is this your doing, Sir? Never was generoſity ſo worthily exerted.

BELCOUR.

Or ſo greatly overpaid.

CHARLOTTE.

After what you have now done for this noble, but indigent, family, let me not ſcruple to unfold the whole ſituation of my heart to you. Know then, Sir, (and don't think the worſe of me for the frankneſs of my declaration) that ſuch is my attachment to the ſon of that worthy officer whom you relieved, that the moment I am of age, and in poſſeſſion of my fortune, I ſhou'd hold myſelf the happieſt of women to ſhare it with young Dudley.

BELCOUR.

Say you ſo, madam! then let me periſh if I don't love and reverence you above all woman kind; and if ſuch is your generous reſolution, never wait till you're of age; life is too ſhort, pleaſure too fugitive; the ſoul grows narrower every hour; I'll equip you for your eſcape; I'll convoy you to the man of your heart, and away with you then to the firſt hoſpitable parſon, that will take you in.

CHARLOTTE.

O bleſſed be the torrid zone for ever, whoſe rapid vegetation quickens nature into ſuch benignity! Theſe latitudes are made for politics and philoſophy; friendſhip has no root in this ſoil. But had I ſpirit to accept your offer, which is not improbable, wou'dn't it be a mortifying thing, for a fond girl to find herſelf miſtaken, and ſent back to her home, like a vagrant; and ſuch, for what I know, might be my caſe.

BELCOUR.

Then he ought to be proſcribed the ſociety of mankind for ever——Ay, ay, 'tis the ſham ſiſter makes him thus indifferent; 'twill be a meritorious office to take that girl out of the way.

(Servant enters)

SCENE VIII.

SERVANT.

Miſs Dudley to wait on you, madam.

BELCOUR.

Who?

SERVANT.

Miſs Dudley.

CHARLOTTE.

What's the matter, Mr. Belcour? are you frighted at the name of a pretty girl? 'tis the ſiſter of him we were ſpeaking of—pray admit her.

BELCOUR.

The ſiſter! So, ſo; he has impoſed upon her too—this is an extraordinary viſit truly. Upon my ſoul the aſſurance of ſome folks is not to be accounted for.

CHARLOTTE.

I inſiſt upon your not running away; you'll be charm'd with Louiſa Dudley.

BELCOUR.

Oh, yes, I am charm'd with her.

CHARLOTTE.

You've ſeen her then; have you?

BELCOUR.

Yes, yes, I've ſeen her.

CHARLOTTE.

Well, isn't ſhe a delightful girl?

BELCOUR.

Very delightful.

CHARLOTTE.

Why, you anſwer as if you was in a court of juſtice; O'my conſcience! I believe you are caught; I've a notion ſhe has trick'd you out of your heart.

BELCOUR.

I believe ſhe has, and you out of your jewels; for to tell you the truth, ſhe's the very perſon I gave 'em to.

CHARLOTTE.

You gave her my jewels! Louiſa Dudley my jewels? admirable; inimitable! oh, the ſly little jade! but huſh, here ſhe comes; I don't know how I ſhall keep my countenance.

(LOUISA enters.)

My dear, I'm rejoiced to ſee you; how d'ye do? I beg leave to introduce Mr. Belcour, a very worthy friend of mine; I believe, Louiſa, you have ſeen him before.

LOUISA.

I have met the gentleman.

CHARLOTTE.

You have met the gentleman; well, Sir, and you have met the lady; in ſhort, you have met each other; why then don't you ſpeak to each other? How you both ſtand! tongue-tied, and fix'd as ſtatues——Ha, ha, ha! Why you'll fall a-ſleep by-and-by.

LOUISA.

Fye upon you; fye upon you; is this fair?

BELCOUR.

Upon my ſoul I never look'd ſo like a fool in my life; the aſſurance of that girl puts me quite down (aſide).

CHARLOTTE.

Sir—Mr. Belcour—Was it your pleaſure to advance any thing? Not a ſyllable. Come, Louiſa, womens wit, they ſay, is never at a loſs—Nor you neither? Speechleſs both—Why you was merry enough before this lady came in.

LOUISA.

I am ſorry I have been any interruption to your happineſs, Sir.

BELCOUR.

Madam.

CHARLOTTE.

Madam! Is that all you can ſay? but come, my dear girl, I won't teaze you: apropos! I muſt ſhew you what a fine preſent this dumb gentleman has made me; are not eſe handſome diamonds?

LOUISA.

Yes, indeed, they seem very fine; but I am no judge of these things.

CHARLOTTE.

Oh, you wicked little hypocrite, you are no judge of these things, Louisa; you have no diamonds, not you.

LOUISA.

You know I havn't, Miss Rusport; you know those things are infinitely above my reach.

CHARLOTTE.

Ha! ha! ha!

BELCOUR.

She does tell a lie with an admirable countenance, that's true enough.

LOUISA.

What ails you, Charlotte? What impertinence have I been guilty of that you should find it necessary to humble me at such a rate? if you are happy, long may you be so; but, surely, it can be no addition to it to make me miserable.

CHARLOTTE.

So serious! there must be some mystery in this——Mr. Belcour will you leave us together? You see I treat you with all the familiarity of an old acquaintance already.

BELCOUR.

Oh, by all means; pray command me. Miss Rusport, I'm your most obedient! By your condescension in accepting those poor trifles, I am under eternal obligations to you—To you, Miss Dudley, I shall not offer a word on that subject: you despise finery; you have a soul above it; I adore your spirit; I was rather unprepared for meeting you here; but I shall hope for an opportunity of making myself better known to you. [Exit.

SCENE IX.

CHARLOTTE and LOUISA.

CHARLOTTE.

Louisa Dudley, you surprize me; I never saw you act thus before: can't you bear a little innocent raillery before the man of your heart?

LOUISA.

The man of my heart, Madam? Be assured I never was so visionary to aspire to any man whom Miss Rusport honours with her choice.

CHARLOTTE.

My choice, my dear! Why we are playing at cross purposes: how enter'd it into your head that Mr. Belcour was the man of my choice?

LOUISA.

Why didn't he present you with those diamonds?

CHARLOTTE.

Well; perhaps he did—and pray, Louisa, have you no diamonds?

LOUISA.

I diamonds truly! Who should give me diamonds?

CHARLOTTE.

Who, but this very gentleman! Apropos! here comes your brother——

SCENE X.

(CHARLES enters.)

I insist upon referring our dispute to him: your sister and I, Charles, have a quarrel; Belcour, the hero of your letter, has just left us—some how or other, Louisa's bright eyes have caught him; and the poor fellow's fallen desperately in love with her—(don't interrupt me, hussey)—Well, that's excusable enough, you'll say; but the jest of the story is, that this hair-brain'd spark, who does nothing like other people, has given her the very identical jewels, which you pledged for me to Mr. Stockwell; and will you believe that this little demure slut made up a face, and squeezed out three or four hypocritical tears, because I rallied her about it?

CHARLES.

I'm all astonishment! Louisa, tell me without reserve, has Mr. Belcour given you any diamonds?

LOUISA.

None, upon my honour.

CHARLES.

Has he made any professions to you?

LOUISA.

He has, but altogether in a ſtile ſo whimſical and capricious, that the beſt which can be ſaid of them is to tell you that they ſeem'd more the reſult of good ſpirits than good manners.

CHARLOTTE.

Ay, ay, now the murder's out; he's in love with her, and ſhe has no very great diſlike to him; truſt to my obſervation, Charles, for that: as to the diamonds, there's ſome miſtake about them, and you muſt clear it up: three minutes converſation with him will put every thing in a right train; go, go, Charles, 'tis a brother's buſineſs; about it inſtantly; ten to one you'll find him over the way at Mr. Stockwell's.

CHARLES.

I confeſs I'm impatient to have the caſe clear'd up; I'll take your advice, and find him out: good bye to you.

CHARLOTTE.

Your ſervant; my life upon it you'll find Belcour a man of honour. Come, Louiſa, let us adjourn to my dreſſing-room; I've a little private buſineſs to tranſact with you, before the old lady comes up to tea, and interrupts us.

END OF THE THIRD ACT.

ACT IV. SCENE I.

(FULMER's house.)

FULMER and MRS. FULMER.

FULMER.

Patty, wasn't Mr. Belcour with you?

MRS. FULMER.

He was, and is now ſhut up in my chamber, in high expectation of an interview with Miſs Dudley; ſhe's at preſent with her brother, and 'twas with ſome difficulty I perſuaded my hot-headed ſpark to wait 'till he has left her.

FULMER.

Well, child, and what then?

MRS. FULMER.

Why then, Mr. Fulmer, I think it will be time for you and me to ſteal a march, and be gone.

FULMER.

So this is all the fruit of your ingenious project; a ſhameful overthrow, or a ſudden flight.

MRS. FULMER.

Why, my project was a mere impromptu, and can at worſt but quicken our departure a few days; you know we had fairly outliv'd our credit here, and a trip to Boulogne is no ways unſeaſonable. Nay, never droop, man—Hark! hark! here's enough to bear charges. (ſhewing a purſe.)

FULMER.

Let me ſee, let me ſee: this weighs well; this is of the right ſort; why your Weſt-Indian bled freely.

MRS. FULMER.

But that's not all: look here! Here are the ſparklers! (ſhewing the jewels) Now what d'ye think of my performances? Heh! a fooliſh ſcheme, isn't it?—a ſilly woman—!

FULMER.

Thou art a Judith, a Joan of Arc, and I'll march under thy banners, girl, to the world's end: Come, let's begone; I've little to regret; my creditors may ſhare the old books amongſt them, they'll have occaſion for philoſophy to ſupport their loſs; they'll find enough upon my ſhelves: The world is my library; I read mankind—Now, Patty, lead the way.

MRS. FULMER.

Adieu, Belcour! [Exeunt.

SCENE II.

CHARLES DUDLEY and LOUISA.

CHARLES.

Well, Louiſa, I confeſs the force of what you ſay: I accept Miſs Ruſport's bounty, and when you ſee my generous Charlotte, tell her—— but have a care, there is a ſelfiſhneſs even in gratitude, when it is too profuſe; to be over thankful for any one favour, is in effect to lay out for another; the beſt return I cou'd make my benefactreſs wou'd be never to ſee her more.

LOUISA.

I underſtand you.

CHARLES.

We, that are poor, Louiſa, ſhou'd be cautious; for this reaſon I wou'd guard you againſt Belcour; at leaſt till I can unravel the myſtery of Miſs Ruſport's diamonds; I was diſappointed of finding him at Mr. Stockwell's, and am now going in ſearch of him again: he may intend honourably, but I confeſs to you I am ſtagger'd; think no more of him, therefore, for the preſent: of this be ſure, while I have life, and you have honour, I will protect you, or periſh in your defence. [Exit.

LOUISA.

Think of him no more! Well, I'll obey; but if a wand'ring uninvited thought ſhould creep by chance into my boſom, muſt I not give the harmleſs wretch a ſhelter? Oh! yes; the great artificer of the human heart knows every thread he wove into its fabric, nor puts his work to harder uſes than it was made to bear: my wiſhes then, my guiltleſs ones I mean, are free; How faſt they ſpring within me at that ſentence! Down, down, ye buſy creatures! Whither wou'd you carry me? Ah! there is one amongſt you, a forward, new intruder, that in the likeneſs of an offending, generous man, grows into favour with my heart. Fye, fye upon it! Belcour purſues, inſults me; yet ſuch is the fatality of my condition, that what ſhou'd rouſe reſentment, only calls up love.

SCENE III.

(BELCOUR enters to her)

BELCOUR.

Alone, by all that's happy!

LOUISA.

Ah!

BELCOUR.

Oh! ſhriek not, ſtart not, ſtir not, loveliеſt creature! but let me kneel, and gaze upon your beauties.

LOUISA.

Sir, Mr. Belcour, riſe! What is it you do?

BELCOUR.

See, I obey you; mould me as you will, behold your ready ſervant! New to your country, ignorant of your manners, habits, and deſires, I put myſelf into your hands for inſtruction; make me only ſuch as you can like yourſelf, and I ſhall be happy.

LOUISA.

I muſt not hear this, Mr. Belcour; go; ſhould he, that parted from me but this minute, now return, I tremble for the conſequence.

BELCOUR.

Fear nothing; let him come: I love you, Madam; he'll find it hard to make me unſay that.

LOUISA.

You terrify me; your impetuous temper frightens me; you know my ſituation; it is not generous to purſue me thus.

BELCOUR.

True; I do know your ſituation, your real one, Miſs Dudley, and am reſolv'd to ſnatch you from it; 'twill be a meritorious act; the old Captain ſhall rejoice; Miſs Ruſport ſhall be made happy; and even he, even your beloved brother, with whoſe reſentment you threaten me, ſhall in the end applaud and thank me: Come, thou'rt a dear enchanting girl, and I'm determin'd not to live a minute longer without thee.

LOUISA.

Hold, are you mad? I ſee you are a bold, aſſuming man, and know not where to ſtop.

BELCOUR.

Who that beholds ſuch beauty can? By Heaven, you put my blood into a flame. Provoking girl! is it within the ſtretch of my fortune to content you? What is it you can further aſk that I am not ready to grant?

LOUISA.

Yes, with the ſame facility that you beſtow'd upon me Miſs Ruſport's diamonds. For ſhame! for ſhame! was that a manly ſtory?

BELCOUR.

So! ſo! theſe deviliſh diamonds meet me every where—Let me periſh if I meant you any harm: Oh! I cou'd tear my tongue out for ſaying a word about the matter.

LOUISA.

Go to her then, and contradict it; till that is done, my reputation is at ſtake.

BELCOUR.

Her reputation! Now ſhe has got upon that, ſhe'll go on for ever.—What is there I will not do for your ſake? I will go to Miſs Ruſport.

LOUISA.

Do ſo; reſtore her own jewels to her, which I ſuppoſe you kept back for the purpoſe of preſenting others to her of a greater value; but for the future, Mr. Belcour, when you wou'd do a galant action to that lady, don't let it be at my expence.

BELCOUR.

I see where she points: she is willing enough to give up Miss Rusport's diamonds, now she finds she shall be a gainer by the exchange. Be it so! 'tis what I wish'd.—Well, Madam, I will return Miss Rusport her own jewels, and you shall have others of tenfold their value.

LOUISA.

No, Sir, you err most widely; it is my good opinion, not my vanity, which you must bribe.

BELCOUR.

Why, what the devil wou'd she have now?—Miss Dudley, it is my wish to obey and please you, but I have some apprehension that we mistake each other.

LOUISA.

I think we do: tell me, then, in few words, what it is you aim at.

BELCOUR.

In few words, then, and in plain honesty, I must tell you, so entirely am I captivated with you, that had you but been such as it wou'd have become me to have call'd my wife, I had been happy in knowing you by that name; as it is, you are welcome to partake my fortune, give me in return your person, give me pleasure, give me love; free, disencumber'd, antimatrimonial love.

LOUISA.

Stand off, and let me never see you more.

BELCOUR.

Hold, hold, thou dear, tormenting, tantalizing girl! Upon my knees I swear you shall not stir till you've consented to my bliss.

LOUISA.

Unhand me, Sir: O Charles! protect me, rescue me, redress me. [Exit.

SCENE IV.

CHARLES DUDLEY enters.

CHARLES.

How's this? Rise, villain, and defend yourself.

BELCOUR.

Villain!

CHARLES.

The man who wrongs that lady is a villain—Draw!

BELCOUR.

Never fear me, young gentleman; brand me for a coward, if I baulk you.

CHARLES.

Yet hold! Let me not be too hasty; your name, I think, is Belcour?

BELCOUR.

Well, Sir.

CHARLES.

How is it, Mr. Belcour, you have done this mean, unmanly wrong; beneath the mask of generosity to give this fatal stab to our domestic peace? You might have had my thanks, my blessing; take my defiance now. 'Tis Dudley speaks to you, the brother, the protector of that injur'd lady.

BELCOUR.

The brother! Give yourself a truer title.

CHARLES.

What is't you mean!

BELCOUR.

Come, come, I know both her and you: I found you, Sir, (but how or why I know not) in the good graces of Miss Rusport—(yes, colour at the name!) I gave you no disturbance there, never broke in upon you in that rich and plenteous quarter; but, when I cou'd have blasted all your projects with a word, spar'd you, in foolish pity spar'd you; nor rous'd her from the fond credulity in which your artifice had lull'd her.

CHARLES.

No, Sir, nor boasted to her of the splendid present you had made my poor Louisa; the diamonds, Mr. Belcour; How was that? What can you plead to that arraignment?

BELCOUR.

You question me too late; the name of Belcour and of villain never met before: had you enquir'd of me before you utter'd that rash word, you might have sav'd yourself or me a mortal error; now, Sir, I neither give nor take an explanation; so, come on! [They fight.

SCENE V.

LOUISA, and afterwards O'FLAHERTY.

LOUISA.

Hold, hold, for Heaven's ſake hold! Charles! Mr. Belcour! Help! Sir, Sir, make haſte, they'll murder one another.

O'FLAHERTY.

Hell and confuſion! What's all this uproar for? Can't you leave off cutting one another's throats, and mind what the poor girl ſays to you? You've done a notable thing, hav'n't you, both, to put her into ſuch a flurry? I think, o' my conſcience, ſhe's the moſt frighted of the three.

CHARLES.

Dear Louiſa, recollect yourſelf; why did you interfere? 'Tis in your cauſe.

BELCOUR.

Now cou'd I kill him for careſſing her.

O'FLAHERTY.

O Sir, your moſt obedient! You are the gentleman I had the honour of meeting here before; you was then running off at full ſpeed like a Calmuck, now you are tilting and driving like a Bedlamite with this lad here, that ſeems as mad as yourſelf: 'Tis pity but your country had a little more employment for you both.

BELCOUR.

Mr. Dudley, when you've recover'd the lady, you know where I am to be found. [Exit.

O'FLAHERTY.

Well then, can't you ſtay where you are, and that will ſave the trouble of looking after you? Yon volatile fellow thinks to give a man the meeting by getting out of his way: by my ſoul 'tis a round-about method that of his. But I think he call'd you Dudley: Hark'e, young man, are you ſon of my friend the old Captain?

CHARLES.

I am. Help me to convey this lady to her chamber, and I ſhall be more at leiſure to anſwer your queſtions.

O'FLAHERTY.

Ay will I: come along, pretty one; if you've had wrong done you, young man, you need look no further for a second; Dennis O'Flaherty's your man for that; but never draw your ſword before a woman, Dudley; damn it, never while you live draw your ſword before a woman. [Exeunt.

SCENE VI.

LADY RUSPORT's Houſe.

LADY RUSPORT and SERVANT.

SERVANT.

An elderly gentleman, who ſays his name is Varland, deſires leave to wait on your ladyſhip.

LADY RUSPORT.

Shew him in; the very man I wiſh to ſee: Varland; he was Sir Oliver's ſollicitor, and privy to all his affairs; he brings ſome good tidings; ſome freſh mortgage, or another bond come to light; they ſtart up every day. (VARLAND enters.) Mr. Varland, I'm glad to ſee you; you're heartily welcome, honeſt Mr. Varland; you and I havn't met ſince our late irreparable loſs: how have you paſſed your time this age?

VARLAND.

Truly, my lady, ill enough: I thought I muſt have followed good Sir Oliver.

LADY RUSPORT.

Alack-a-day, poor man! Well, Mr. Varland, you find me here overwhelmed with trouble and fatigue; torn to pieces with a multiplicity of affairs; a great fortune poured upon me unſought for and unexpected: 'twas my good father's will and pleaſure it ſhould be ſo, and I muſt ſubmit.

VARLAND.

Your ladyſhip inherits under a will made in the year forty-five, immediately after Captain Dudley's marriage with your ſiſter.

LADY RUSPORT.

I do ſo, Mr. Varland; I do ſo.

VARLAND.

I well remember it; I engroſſed every ſyllable; but I am ſurprized to find your ladyſhip ſet ſo little ſtore by this vaſt acceſſion.

LADY RUSPORT.

Why you know, Mr. Varland, I am a moderate woman; I had enough before; a ſmall matter ſatisfies me; and Sir Stephen Ruſport (Heaven be his portion!) took care I ſhoudn't want that.

VARLAND.

Very true; very true, he did ſo; and I am overjoyed at finding your ladyſhip in this diſpoſition; for, truth to ſay, I was not without apprehenſion the news I have to communicate would have been of ſome prejudice to your ladyſhip's tranquility.

LADY RUSPORT.

News, Sir! What news have you for me?

VARLAND.

Nay, nothing to alarm you; a trifle, in your preſent way of thinking: I have a will of Sir Oliver's you have never ſeen.

LADY RUSPORT.

A will! Impoſſible! How came you by it, pray?

VARLAND.

I drew it up, at his command, in his laſt illneſs: it will ſave you a world of trouble: it gives his whole eſtate from you to his grandſon, Charles Dudley.

LADY RUSPORT.

To Dudley? His eſtate to Charles Dudley? I can't ſupport it! I ſhall faint! You've killed me, you vile man! I never ſhall ſurvive it!

VARLAND.

Look'e there now: I proteſt, I thought you would have rejoiced at being clear of the incumbrance.

LADY RUSPORT.

'Tis falſe; 'tis all a forgery, concerted between you and Dudley; why elſe did I never hear of it before?

VARLAND.

Have patience, my lady, and I'll tell you: By Sir Oliver's direction, I was to deliver this will into no hands but his grandſon Dudley's: the young gentleman happen'd to he then in Scotland: I was dispatch'd thither in search of him; the hurry and fatigue of my journey brought on a fever by the way, which confined me in extreme danger for several days; upon my recovery, I pursued my journey, found young Dudley had left Scotland in the interim, and am now directed hither; where, as soon as I can find him, doubtless, I shall discharge my conscience, and fulfil my commission.

LADY RUSPORT.

Dudley then, as yet, knows nothing of this will?

VARLAND.

Nothing; that secret rests with me.

LADY RUSPORT.

A thought occurs: by this fellow's talking of his conscience, I should guess it was upon sale (aside.) Come, Mr. Varland, if 'tis as you say, I must submit. I was somewhat flurried at first, and forgot myself; I ask your pardon: this is no place to talk of business; step with me into my room; we will there compare the will, and resolve accordingly——Oh! would your sister had you, and I had your papers. [Exeunt.

SCENE VII.

MISS RUSPORT, CHARLES, and O'FLAHERTY.

CHARLOTTE.

So, so! My lady and her lawyer have retired to close confabulation; now, Major, if you are the generous man I take you for, grant me one favour.

CHARLES.

Faith will I, and not think much of my generosity neither; for, though it may not be in my power to do the favour you ask, look you, it can never be in my heart to refuse it.

CHARLES.

Cou'd this man's tongue do justice to his thoughts, how eloquent would he be!

CHARLOTTE.

Plant yourself then in that room, for a few moments, with the door a little open beyond; and if they should quarrel fully, step in with a moment, till your friend here can make good his retreat down the back-stairs.

O'FLAHERTY.

A word to the wise! I'm an old campaigner; make the best use of your time; and trust me for tying the old cat up to the picket.

CHARLOTTE.

Hush! hush! not so loud.

CHARLES.

'Tis the office of a centinel, Major, you have undertaken, rather than that of a field-officer.

O'FLAHERTY.

'Tis the office of a friend, my dear boy; and, therefore, no disgrace to a general. [Exit.

SCENE VIII.

CHARLES and CHARLOTTE.

CHARLOTTE.

Well, Charles, will you commit yourself to me for a few minutes?

CHARLES.

Most readily; and let me, before one goes by, tender you the only payment I can ever make for your abundant generosity.

CHARLOTTE.

Hold, hold! so vile a thing as money must not come between us. What shall I say! O Charles! O Dudley! What difficulties have you thrown upon me! Familiarly as we have lived, I shrink at what I'm doing; and, anxiously as I have sought this opportunity, my fears almost persuade me to abandon it.

CHARLES.

You alarm me!

CHARLOTTE.

Your looks and actions have been so distant, and at this moment are so deterring, that, was it not for the hope that delicacy, and not disgust, inspires this conduct in you, I should sink with shame and apprehension; but time presses; and I must speak; and plainly too—Was you now in pos-ſeſſion of your grandfather's eſtate, as juſtly you ought to be, and was you inclined to ſeek a companion for life, ſhould you, or ſhould you not, in that caſe, honour your unworthy Charlotte with your choice?

CHARLES.

My unworthy Charlotte! So judge me Heaven, there is not a circumſtance on earth ſo valuable as your happineſs, ſo dear to me as your perſon; but to bring poverty, diſgrace, reproach from friends, ridicule from all the world upon a generous benefactreſs; thelvithly to ſteal into an open, unreſerved, ingenuous heart. O Charlotte! dear, unhappy girl, it is not to be done.

CHARLOTTE.

Nay, now you rate too highly the poor advantages fortune alone has given me over you: how otherwiſe could we bring our merits to any ballance? Come, my dear Charles, I have enough; make that enough ſtill more by ſharing it with me: ſole heireſs of my father's fortune, a ſhort time will put it in my diſpoſal; in the mean while you will be ſent to join your regiment; let us prevent a ſeparation, by ſetting out this very night for that happy country where marriage ſtill is free: carry me this moment to Belcour's lodgings.

CHARLES.

Belcour's!—The name is ominous; there's murder in it; bloody inexorable honour! (aſide.)

CHARLOTTE.

D'ye pauſe? Put me into his hands, while you provide the means for our eſcape; he is the moſt generous, the moſt honourable of men.

CHARLES.

Honourable! moſt honourable!

CHARLOTTE.

Can you doubt it? Do you demur? Have you forgot your letter? Why, Belcour 'twas that prompted me to this propoſal, that promiſed to ſupply the means, that nobly offer'd his unaſk'd aſſiſtance——

(O'FLAHERTY enters haſtily.)

O'FLAHERTY.

Run, run, for holy St. Antony's ſake, to horſe and away! The conference is broke up, and the old lady advances upon a full piedmontese trot, within pistol-shot of your encampment.

CHARLOTTE.

Here, here, down the back-stairs! O, Charles, remember me!

CHARLES.

Farewell! Now, now I feel myself a coward. [Exit.

CHARLOTTE.

What does he mean?

O'FLAHERTY.

Ask no questions, but be gone: she has cooled the lad's courage, and wonders he feels like a coward. There's a damn'd deal of mischief brewing between this hyena and her lawyer: egad I'll step behind this screen and listen—a good soldier must sometimes fight in ambush as well as open field (retires.)

SCENE IX.

LADY RUSPORT and VARLAND.

LADY RUSPORT.

Sure I heard somebody. Hark! No; only the servants going down the back stairs. Well, Mr. Varland, I think then we are agreed; you'll take my money; and your conscience no longer stands in your way.

VARLAND.

Your father was my benefactor; his will ought to be sacred; but, if I commit it to the flames, how will he be the wiser? Dudley, 'tis true, has done me no harm; but five thousand pounds will do me much good; so, in short, Madam, I take your offer; I will confer with my clerk, who witnessed the will; and to-morrow morning put it into your hands, upon condition you put five thousand good pounds into mine.

LADY RUSPORT.

'Tis a bargain; I'll be ready for you. Farewell. [Exit.

VARLAND.

Let me consider—Five thousand pounds prompt payment for destroying this scrap of paper, not worth five farthings; 'tis a fortune easily earn'd; yes, and 'tis another man's fortune easily thrown away: 'tis a good round sum to be paid down at once for a bribe, but 'tis a damn'd rogue's trick in me to take it.

O'FLAHERTY. (aside.)

So, so! this fellow speaks truth to himself, tho' he lies to other people—but hush!

VARLAND.

'Tis breaking the trust of my benefactor, that's a foul crime, but he's dead, and can never reproach me with it; and 'tis robbing young Dudley of his lawful patrimony, that's a hard case, but he's alive and knows nothing of the matter.

O'FLAHERTY. (aside.)

These lawyers are so used to bring off the rogueries of others, that they are never without an excuse for their own.

VARLAND.

Were I assured now that Dudley would give me half the money for producing this will, that Lady Rufport does for concealing it, I wou'd deal with him, and be an honest man at half price; I wish every gentleman of my profession cou'd lay his hand on his heart and say the same thing.

O'FLAHERTY.

A bargain, old gentleman! Nay, never start, nor stare, you wasn't afraid of your own conscience, never be afraid of me.

VARLAND.

Of you, Sir; who are you, pray?

O'FLAHERTY.

I'll tell you who I am; you seem to wish to be honest, but want the heart to set about it; now I am the very man in the world to make you so; for if you do not give me up that paper this very instant, by the soul of me, fellow, I will not leave one whole bone in your skin that shan't be broken.

VARLAND.

What right have you, pray, to take this paper from me?

O'FLAHERTY.

What right have you, pray, to keep it from young Dudley? I don't know what it contains, but I am apt to think it will be safer in my hands than in your's; therefore give it me without more words, and save yourself a beating; do now; you had best.

VARLAND.

Well, Sir, I may as well make a grace of neceſſity. There! I have acquitted my conſcience, at the expence of five thouſand pounds.

O'FLAHERTY.

Five thouſand pounds! Mercy upon me! When there are ſuch temptations in the law, can we wonder if ſome of the corps are a diſgrace to it?

VARLAND.

Well, you have got the paper; if you are an honeſt man, give it to Charles Dudley.

O'FLAHERTY.

An honeſt man! look at me friend, I am a ſoldier, this is not the livery of a knave; I am an Iriſhman, honey, mine is not the country of diſhonor. Now, Sirrah, be gone; if you enter theſe doors, or give Lady Ruſport the leaſt item of what has paſſed, I will cut off both your ears, and rob the pillory of its due.

VARLAND.

I wiſh I was once fairly out of his ſight. [Exeunt.

SCENE X.

(A Room in STOCKWELL's Houſe.)

STOCKWELL.

I muſt diſcloſe myſelf to Belcour; this noble inſtance of his generoſity, which old Dudley has been relating, allies me to him at once; concealment becomes too painful; I ſhall be proud to own him for my ſon.—But ſee, he's here.

(BELCOUR enters and throws himſelf on a ſopha.)

BELCOUR.

O my curſt tropical conſtitution! wou'd to Heaven I had been dropt upon the ſnows of Lapland, and never felt the bleſſed influence of the Sun, ſo I had never burnt with theſe inflammatory paſſions!

STOCKWELL.

So, ſo, you ſeem diſorder'd, Mr. Belcour.

BELCOUR.

Diſorder'd, Sir! why did I ever quit the ſoil in which I grew; what evil planet drew me from that warm ſunny region, where naked nature walks without diſguiſe, into this cold contriving artificial country?

STOCKWELL.

Come, Sir, you've met a raſcal; what o'that? general concluſions are illiberal.

BELCOUR.

No, Sir, I've met reflection by the way; I've come from folly, noiſe and fury, and met a ſilent monitor—Well, well, a villian! 'twas not to be pardon'd—pray never mind me, Sir.

STOCKWELL.

Alas! my heart bleeds for him.

BELCOUR.

And yet I might have heard him: now plague upon that blundering Iriſhman for coming in as he did; the hurry of the deed might paliate the event; deliberate execution has leſs to plead—Mr. Stockwell, I am bad company to you.

STOCKWELL.

Oh, Sir; make no excuſe. I think you have not found me forward to pry into the ſecrets of your pleaſures and purſuits; 'tis not my diſpoſition; but there are times, when want of curioſity, wou'd be want of friendſhip.

BELCOUR.

Ah, Sir, mine is a caſe wherein you and I ſhall never think alike; the punctilious rules, by which I am bound, are not to be found in your ledgers, nor will paſs current in the compting-houſe of a trader.

STOCKWELL.

'Tis very well, Sir; if you think I can render you any ſervice; it may be worth your trial to confide in me; if not, your ſecret is ſafer in your own boſom.

BELCOUR.

That ſentiment demands my confidence: pray, ſit down by me. You muſt know, I have an affair of honour on my hands with young Dudley; and tho' I put up with no man's inſult, yet I wiſh to take away no man's life.

STOCKWELL.

I know the young man, and am appris'd of your generosity to his father, what can have bred a quarrel between you?

BELCOUR.

A foolish passion on my side, and a haughty provocation on his. There is a girl, Mr. Stockwell, whom I have unfortunately seen, of most uncommon beauty; she has withal an air of so much natural modesty, that had I not had good assurance of her being an attainable wanton, I declare I shou'd as soon have thought of attempting the chastity of Diana.

(SERVANT enters.)

STOCKWELL.

Hey-day, do you interrupt us?

SERVANT.

Sir, there's an Irish gentleman will take no denial; he says he must see Mr. Belcour directly, upon business of the last consequence.

BELCOUR.

Admit him; 'tis the Irish officer that parted us, and brings me young Dudley's challenge; I should have made a long story of it, and he'll tell it you in three words.

O'FLAHERTY enters.

O'FLAHERTY.

Save you, my dear; and you, Sir! I have a little bit of a word in private for you.

BELCOUR.

Pray deliver your commands; this gentleman is my intimate friend.

O'FLAHERTY.

Why then, Ensign Dudley will be glad to measure swords with you, yonder at the London Tavern, in Bishopsgate-Street, at nine o'clock—you know the place.

BELCOUR.

I do; and shall observe the appointment.

O'FLAHERTY.

Will you be of the party, Sir? We shall want a fourth hand.

STOCKWELL.

Savage as the cuſtom is, I cloſe with your propoſal, and tho' I am not fully inform'd of the occaſion of your quarrel, I ſhall rely on Mr. Belcour's honour for the juſtice of it; and willingly ſtake my life in his defence.

O'FLAHERTY.

Sir, you're a gentleman of honour, and I ſhall be glad of being better known to you——But hark'ee, Belcour, I had like to have forgot part of my errand: there is the money you gave old Dudley; you may tell it over faith; 'tis a receipt in full; now the lad can put you to death with a ſafe conſcience, and when he has done that job for you, let it be a warning how you attempt the ſiſter of a man of honour.

BELCOUR.

The ſiſter!

to O'FLAHERTY.

Ay, the ſiſter; 'tis Engliſh, is it not? Or Iriſh; 'tis all one; you underſtand me, his ſiſter, or Louiſa Dudley, that's her name I think, call her which you will: by St. Patrick, 'tis a fooliſh piece of a buſineſs, Belcour, to go about to take away a poor girl's virtue from her, when there are ſo many to be met in this town, who have diſpos'd of their's to your hands. [Exit.

STOCKWELL.

Why I am thunderſtruck! what is it you have done, and what is the ſhocking buſineſs in which I have engaged? If I underſtood him right, 'tis the ſiſter of young Dudley you've been attempting: you talk'd to me of a profeſt wanton; the girl he ſpeaks of has beauty enough indeed to inflame your deſires, but ſhe has honour, innocence and ſimplicity to awe the moſt licentious paſſion: if you have done that, Mr. Belcour, I renounce you, I abandon you, I forſwear all fellowſhip or friendſhip with you for ever.

BELCOUR.

Have patience for a moment; we do indeed ſpeak of the ſame perſon, but ſhe is not innocent, ſhe is not young Dudley's ſiſter.

STOCKWELL.

Aſtoniſhing! who told you this?

BELCOUR.

The woman where ſhe lodges; the perſon who put me on the purſuit and contriv'd our meetings.

STOCKWELL.

What woman? What perſon?

BELCOUR.

Fulmer her name is: I warrant you I did not proceed without good grounds.

STOCKWELL.

Fulmer, Fulmer? Who waits? (a Servant enters) ſend Mr. Stukely hither directly; I begin to ſee my way into this dark tranſaction: Mr. Belcour, Mr. Belcour, your are no match for the cunning and contrivances of this intriguing town. (Stukely enters) prythee, Stukely, what is the name of the woman and her huſband, who were ſtopt upon ſuſpicion of ſelling ſtolen diamonds at our next-door neighbour's, the jeweller?

STUKELY.

Fulmer.

STOCKWELL.

So!

BELCOUR.

Can you procure me a ſight of thoſe diamonds?

STUKELY.

They are now in my hand; I was deſir'd to ſhow them to Mr. Stockwell.

STOCKWELL.

Give 'em to me: what do I ſee? As I live, the very diamonds Miſs Ruſport ſent hither, and which I intruſted to you to return.

BELCOUR.

Yes, but I betray'd that truſt, and gave 'em Mrs. Fulmer to preſent to Miſs Dudley.

STOCKWELL.

With a view no doubt to bribe her to compliance.

BELCOUR.

BELCOUR.

I own it.

STOCKWELL.

For ſhame, for ſhame? and 'twas this woman's intelligence you relied upon for Miſs Dudley's character?

BELCOUR.

I thought ſhe knew her; by Heaven, I wou'd have died ſooner than have inſulted a woman of virtue, or a man of honour.

STOCKWELL.

I think you wou'd, but mark the danger of licentious courſes; you are betray'd, robb'd, abus'd, and but for this providential diſcovery in a fair way of being ſent out of the world with all your follies on your head.—Dear Stukely, go to my neighbour, tell him I have an owner for the jewels, and beg him to carry the people under cuſtody to the London Tavern, and wait for me there. [Exit Stukely.

I fear the law does not provide a puniſhment to reach the villiany of theſe people; but how in the name of wonder cou'd you take any thing on the word of ſuch an informer?

BELCOUR.

Becauſe I had not liv'd long enough in your country to know how few informers words are to be taken: perſwaded however as I was of Miſs Dudley's guilt, I muſt own to you I was ſtagger'd with the appearance of ſuch innocence, eſpecially when I ſaw her admitted into Miſs Ruſport's company.

STOCKWELL.

Good Heaven! did you meet her at Miſs Ruſport's, and cou'd you doubt her being a woman of reputation?

BELCOUR.

By you perhaps ſuch a miſtake cou'd not have been made, but in a perfect ſtranger, I hope it is venial: I did not know what artifices young Dudley might have us'd to conceal her character; I did not know what diſgrace attended the detection of it.

STOCKWELL.

I see it was a trap laid for you, which you have narrowly escap'd; you address'd a woman of honour with all the loose incense of a profane admirer, and you have drawn upon you the resentment of a man of honour who thinks himself bound to protect her: Well, Sir, you must atone for this mistake.

BELCOUR.

To the lady the most penitent submission I can make is justly due, but in the execution of an act of justice it never shall be said my soul was swayed by the least particle of fear: I have received a challenge from her brother; now tho' I wou'd give my fortune, almost my life itself, to purchase her happiness, yet I cannot abate her one scruple of my honour; I have been branded with the name of villain.

STOCKWELL.

Ay, Sir, you mistook her character and he mistook yours; error begets error.

BELCOUR.

Villain, Mr. Stockwell, is a harsh word.

STOCKWELL.

It is a harsh word, and should be unsaid.

BELCOUR

Come, come, it shall be unsaid.

STOCKWELL.

Or else what follows? why the sword is drawn and to heal the wrongs you have done to the reputation of the sister, you make an honourable amends by murdering the brother.

BELCOUR.

Murdering!

STOCKWELL.

'Tis thus religion writes and speaks the word; in the vocabulary of modern honour there is no such term—But come, I don't despair of satisfying the one without alarming the other; that done, I have a discovery to unfold that you will then I hope be fitted to receive.

END OF THE FOURTH ACT.

ACT V. SCENE I.

The London Tavern.

O'FLAHERTY, STOCKWELL, CHARLES, and BELCOUR.

O'FLAHERTY.

GEntlemen, well met; you underſtand each other's minds, and as I ſee you have brought nothing but your ſwords, you may ſet to without any further ceremony.

STOCKWELL.

You will not find us backward in any worthy cauſe; but before we proceed any further, I would aſk this young gentleman, whether he has any explanation to require of Mr. Belcour.

CHARLES.

Of Mr. Belcour none; his actions ſpeak for themſelves: but to you, ſir, I would fain propoſe one queſtion.

STOCKWELL.

Name it.

CHARLES.

How is it, Mr. Stockwell, that I meet a man of your character on this ground?

STOCKWELL.

I will anſwer you directly, and my anſwer ſhall not diſpleaſe you. I come hither in defence of the reputation of Miſs Dudley, to redreſs the injuries of an innocent young lady.

O'FLAHERTY.

By my ſoul the man knows he's to fight, only he miſtakes which ſide he's to be of.

STOCKWELL.

You are about to draw your ſword to refute a charge againſt your ſiſter's honour; you would do well, if there were no better means within reach; but the proofs of her innocence are lodg'd in our boſoms, and if if we fall, you deſtroy the evidence that moſt effectually can clear her fame.

CHARLES.

How's that, Sir?

STOCKWELL.

This gentleman could beſt explain it to you, but you have given him an undeſerv'd name that ſeals his lips againſt you: I am not under the ſame inhibition, and if your anger can keep cool for a few minutes, I deſire I may call in two witneſſes, who will ſolve all difficulties at once. Here, waiter! bring thoſe people in that are without.

O'FLAHERTY.

Out upon it, what need is there for ſo much talking about the matter; can't you ſettle your differences firſt, and diſpute about 'em afterwards?

(FULMER and Mrs. FULMER brought in.)

CHARLES.

Fulmer and his wife in cuſtody?

STOCKWELL.

Yes, Sir, theſe are your honeſt landlord and landlady, now in cuſtody for defrauding this gentleman of certain diamonds intended to have been preſented to your ſiſter. Be ſo good, Mrs. Fulmer, to inform the company why you ſo groſsly ſcandalized the reputation of an innocent lady, by perſuading Mr. Belcour that Miſs Dudley was not the ſiſter, but the miſtreſs, of this gentleman.

Mrs. FULMER.

Sir, I don't know what right you have to queſtion me, and I ſhall not anſwer till I ſee occaſion.

STOCKWELL.

Had you been as ſilent heretofore, Madam, it would have ſaved you ſome trouble; but we don't want your confeſſion. This letter, which you wrote to Mr. Belcour, will explain your deſign; and theſe diamonds, which of right belong to Miſs Rutport, will confirm your guilt: the law, Mrs. Fulmer, will make you ſpeak, tho' I can't. Conſtable, take charge of your priſoners.

FULMER.

FULMER.

Hold a moment: Mr. Stockwell, you are a gentleman that knows the world, and a member of parliament; we shall not attempt to impose upon you; we know we are open to the law, and we know the utmost it can do against us. Mr. Belcour has been ill used to be sure, and so has Miss Dudley; and, for my own part, I always condemn'd the plot as a very foolish plot, but it was a child of Mrs. Fulmer's brain, and she would not be put out of conceit with it.

Mrs. FULMER.

You are a very foolish man, Mr. Fulmer, so prythee hold your tongue.

FULMER.

Therefore, as I was saying, if you send her to Bridewell, it won't be amiss; and if you give her a little wholesome discipline, she may be the better for that too: but for me, Mr. Stockwell, who am a man of letters, I must beseech you, Sir, not to bring any disgrace upon my profession.

STOCKWELL.

'Tis you, Mr. Fulmer, not I, that disgrace your profession, therefore begone, nor expect that I will betray the interests of mankind so far as to shew favour to such incendiaries. Take 'em away; I blush to think such wretches should have the power to set two honest men at variance. [Exeunt Fulmer, &c.

CHARLES.

Mr. Belcour, we have mistaken each other; let us exchange forgiveness. I am convinced you intended no affront to my sister, and I ask your pardon for the expression I was betrayed into.

BELCOUR.

'Tis enough, Sir; the error began on my side, and was Miss Dudley here, I would be the first to atone.

STOCKWELL.

Let us all adjourn to my house, and conclude the evening like friends: you will find a little entertainment ready for you; and, if I am not mistaken, Miss Dudley

Dudley and her father will make part of our company. Come, Major, do you consent?

O'FLAHERTY.

Most readily, Mr. Stockwell; a quarrel well made up, is better than a victory hardly earned. Give me your hand, Belcour; o' my conscience you are too honest for the country you live in. And now, my dear lad, since peace is concluded on all sides, I have a discovery to make to you, which you must find out for yourself, for deuce take me if I rightly comprehend it, only that your aunt Rusport is in a conspiracy against you, and a vile rogue of a lawyer, whose name I forget, at the bottom of it.

CHARLES.

What conspiracy? Dear Major, recollect yourself.

O'FLAHERTY.

By my soul, I've no faculty at recollecting myself; but I've a paper somewhere about me, that will tell you more of the matter than I can. When I get to the merchant's, I will endeavour to find it.

CHARLES.

Well, it must be in your own way; but I confess you have thoroughly rous'd my curiosity. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.

STOCKWELL'S House.

Capt. DUDLEY, LOUISA, and STUKELY.

DUDLEY.

And are those wretches, Fulmer and his wife, in safe custody?

STUKELY.

They are in good hands, I accompanied them to the Tavern, where your son was to be, and then went in search of you. You may be sure Mr. Stockwell will enforce the law against them as far as it will go.

DUDLEY.

What mischief might their curs'd machinations have produced, but for this timely discovery!

LOUISA.

LOUISA.

Still I am terrified; I tremble with apprehenſion leſt Mr. Belcour's impetuoſity and Charles's ſpirit ſhou'd not wait for an explanation, but drive them both to extremes, before the miſtake can be unravell'd.

STUKELY.

Mr. Stockwell is with them, Madam, and you have nothing to fear; you cannot ſuppoſe he wou'd aſk you hither for any other purpoſe, but to celebrate their reconciliation and to receive Mr. Belcour's attonement.

DUDLEY.

No, no, Louiſa, Mr. Stockwell's honour and diſcretion guard us againſt all danger or offence; he well knows we will endure no imputation on the honour of our family, and he certainly has invited us to receive ſatisfaction on that ſcore in an amicable way.

LOUISA.

Wou'd to Heaven they were return'd!

STUKELY.

You may expect them every minute; and ſee Madam, agreeable to your wiſh, they are here. [Exit.

SCENE III.

CHARLES enters, and afterwards STOCKWELL and O'FLAHERTY.

LOUISA.

O Charles, O brother, how cou'd you ſerve me ſo how cou'd you tell me you was going to Lady Ruſport's and then ſet out with a deſign of fighting Mr. Belcour? But where is he; where is your antagoniſt?

STOCKWELL.

Captain, I am proud to ſee you, and you Miſs Dudley, do me particular honour: We have been adjuſting, Sir, a very extraordinary and dangerous miſtake, which I take for granted my friend Stukely has explain'd to you.

DUDLEY.

He has; I have too good an opinion of Mr. Belcour to believe he cou'd be guilty of a deſign'd affront to an innocent girl, and I am much too well acquainted with your character to ſuppoſe you cou'd abet him in ſuch deſign; I have no doubt therefore all things will be ſet to rights in very few words when we have the pleaſure of ſeeing Mr. Belcour.

STOCKWELL.

He has only ſtept into the compting-houſe and will wait upon you directly: You will not be over ſtrict, Madam, in weighing Mr. Belcour's conduct to the minuteſt ſcruple; his manners, paſſions and opinions are not as yet aſſimilated to this climate; he comes amongſt you a new character, an inhabitant of a new world and both hoſpitality as well as pity recommend him to our indulgence.

SCENE IV.

BELCOUR enters, bows to Miſs DUDLEY.

BELCOUR.

I am happy and aſham'd to ſee you; no man in his ſenſes wou'd offend you; I forfeited mine and err'd againſt the light of the ſun, when I overlook'd your virtues; but your beauty was predominant and hid them from my ſight; I now perceive I was the dupe of a moſt improbable report, and humbly entreat your pardon.

LOUISA.

Think no more of it; 'twas a miſtake.

BELCOUR.

My life has been compos'd of little elſe; 'twas founded in myſtery and has continued in error: I was once given to hope, Mr. Stockwell, that you was to have deliver'd me from theſe difficulties, but either I do not deſerve your confidence, or I was deceiv'd in my expectations.

STOCKWELL.

When this lady has confirm'd your pardon, I ſhall hold you deſerving of my confidence.

LOUISA.

That was granted the moment it was ask'd.

BELCOUR.

To prove my title to his confidence honour me so far with your's as to allow me a few minutes conversation in private with you. [She turns to her father

DUDLEY.

By all means, Louisa; come, Mr. Stockwell, let us go into another room.

CHARLES.

And now, major O'Flaherty, I claim your promise of a sight of the paper, that is to unravel this conspiracy of my aunt Rusport's. I think I have waited with great patience.

O'FLAHERTY.

I have been endeavouring to call to mind what it was I overheard; I've got the paper and will give you the best account I can of the whole transaction.

[Exeunt.

SCENE V.

BELCOUR and LOUISA.

BELCOUR.

Miss Dudley, I have solicited this audience to repeat to you my penitence and confusion: How shall I atone? What reparation can I make to you and virtue?

LOUISA.

To me there's nothing due, nor any thing demanded of you but your more favourable opinion for the future, if you should chance to think of me: Upon the part of virtue I'm not empower'd to speak, but if hereafter, as you range thro' life, you shou'd surprise her in the person of some wretched female, poor as myself and not so well protected, enforce not your advantage, compleat not your licentious triumph, but raise her, rescue her from shame and sorrow, and reconcile her to herself again.

BELCOUR.

I will, I will; by bearing your idea ever present in my thoughts, virtue shall keep an advocate within me; but tell me, loveliest, when you pardon the offence, can you, all perfect as you are, approve of the offender? As I now cease to view you in that false light I lately did, can you, and in the fulness of your bounty will you, cease also to reflect upon the libertine addresses I have paid you, and look upon me as your reform'd, your rational admirer?

LOUISA.

Are sudden reformations apt to last; and how can I be sure the first fair face you meet will not ensnare affections so unsteady, and that I shall not lose you lightly as I gain'd you?

BELCOUR.

Because tho' you conquer'd me by surprize, I have no inclination to rebel; because since the first moment that I saw you, every instant has improv'd you in my eyes; because by principle as well as passion I am unalterably yours, in short there are ten thousand causes for my love to you, would to Heaven I could plant one in your soft bosom that might move you to return it!

LOUISA.

Nay, Mr. Belcour.——

BELCOUR.

I know I am not worthy your regard; I know I'm tainted with a thousand faults, sick of a thousand follies, but there's a healing virtue in your eyes that makes recovery certain; I cannot be a villain in your arms.

LOUISA.

That you can never be; whomever you shall honour with your choice, my life upon't that woman will be happy; it is not from suspicion that I hesitate, it is from honour; tis the severity of my condition, it is the world that never will interpret fairly in our case.

BELCOUR.

BELCOUR.

Oh, what am I, and who in this wide world concerns himself for such a homeless, friendless thing as I am? I beg, Miss Dudley, I've not yet obtain'd your pardon.

LOUISA.

Nay, that you are in full poſſeſſion of.

BELCOUR.

Oh, ſeal it with your hand then, loveliest of women, confirm it with your heart; make me honourably happy, and crown your penitent not with your pardon only, but your love.

LOUISA.

My love!——

BELCOUR.

By Heav'n my ſoul is conquer'd with your virtues more than my eyes are raviſh'd with your beauty: Oh, may this ſoft, this ſenſitive alarm be happy, be auſpicious! Doubt not, deliberate not, delay not; if happineſs be the end of life, why do we ſlip a moment?

SCENE VI.

O'FLAHERTY enters, and afterwards DUDLEY and CHARLES with STOCKWELL.

O'FLAHERTY.

Joy, joy, joy! ſing, dance, leap, laugh for joy! Ha' done making love and fall down on your knees to every ſaint in the calendar, for they're all on your ſide and honeſt St. Patrick at the head of them.

CHARLES.

O Louiſa, ſuch an event! by the luckieſt chance in life we have diſcover'd a will of my grandfather's made in his laſt illneſs, by which he cuts off my Aunt Ruſport with a ſmall annuity, and leaves me heir to his whole eſtate, with a fortune of fifteen thouſand pounds to yourſelf.

LOUISA.

What is it you tell me? O Sir, inſtruct me to ſupport this unexpected turn of fortune. [To her father.

DUDLEY.

DUDLEY.

Name not fortune; 'tis the work of providence, 'tis the juſtice of Heaven that would not ſuffer innocence to be oppreſs'd, nor your baſe aunt to proſper in her cruelty and cunning.

[A ſervant whiſpers Belcour, and he goes out.

O'FLAHERTY.

You ſhall pardon me, Capt. Dudley, but you muſt not overlook St. Patrick neither, for by my ſoul if he had not put it into my head to ſlip behind the ſcreen when your righteous aunt and the lawyer were plotting together, I don't ſee how you would ever have come at the paper there, that Maſter Stockwell is reading.

DUDLEY.

True my good friend, you are the father of this diſcovery, but how did you contrive to get this will from the lawyer?

O'FLAHERTY.

By force, my dear, the only way of getting any thing from a lawyer's clutches.

STOCKWELL.

Well, Major, when he brings his action of aſſault and battery againſt you, the leaſt Dudley can do is to defend you with the weapons you have put into his hands.

CHARLES.

That I am bound to do, and after the happineſs I ſhall have in ſheltering a father's age from the viciſſitudes of life, my next delight will be in offering you an aſylum in the boſom of your country.

O'FLAHERTY.

And upon my ſoul, my dear, 'tis high time I was there, for 'tis now thirty long years ſince I ſat foot in my native country, and by the power of St. Patrick I ſwear I think it's worth all the reſt of the world put together.

DUDLEY.

Ay, Major, much about that time have I been beating the round of ſervice, and 'twere well for us both to give give over; we have ſtood many a tough gale and abundance of hard blows, but Charles ſhall lay us up in a little private, but ſafe, harbour, where we'll reſt from our labours, and peacefully wind up the remainder of our days.

O'FLAHERTY.

Agreed, and you may take it as a proof of my eſteem, young man, that Major O'Flaherty accepts a favour at your hands, for by Heaven I'd ſooner ſtarve, than ſay I thank you to the man I deſpiſe: But I believe you are an honeſt lad, and I'm glad you've trounc'd the old cat, for on my conſcience I believe I muſt otherwiſe have married her myſelf to have let you in for a ſhare of her fortune.

STOCKWELL.

Hey day, what's become of Belcour?

LOUISA.

One of your ſervants call'd him out juſt now and ſeemingly on ſome earneſt occaſion.

STOCKWELL.

I hope, Miſs Dudley, he has aton'd to you as a gentleman ought.

LOUISA.

Mr. Belcour, Sir, will always do what a gentleman ought, and in my caſe I fear only you will think he has done too much.

STOCKWELL.

What has he done; and what can be too much? Pray Heaven, it may be as I wiſh! [aſide.

DUDLEY.

Let us hear it, child.

LOUISA.

With confuſion for my own unworthineſs, I confeſs to you he has offer'd me——

STOCKWELL.

Himſelf.

LOUISA.

LOUISA.

'Tis true.

STOCKWELL.

Then I am happy; all my doubts, my cares are over, and I may own him for my ſon.——Why theſe are joyful tidings: come, my good friend, aſſiſt me in diſpoſing your lovely daughter to accept this returning prodigal; he is no unprincipled, no harden'd libertine; his love for you and virtue is the ſame.

DUDLEY.

'Twere vile ingratitude in me to doubt his merit.—What ſays my child?

O'FLAHERTY.

Begging your pardon now, 'tis a frivolous ſort of a queſtion, that of yours; for you may ſee plainly enough by the young lady's looks, that ſhe ſays a great deal, though ſhe ſpeaks never a word.

CHARLES.

Well, ſiſter, I believe the Major has fairly interpreted the ſtate of your heart.

LOUISA.

I own it; and what muſt that heart be, which love, honour and beneficence like Mr. Belcour's can make no impreſſion on?

STOCKWELL.

I thank you: What happineſs has this hour brought to paſs!

O'FLAHERTY.

Why don't we all ſit down to ſupper then and make a night on't.

STOCKWELL.

Hold, here comes Belcour.

SCENE VII.

BELCOUR introducing Miſs RUSPORT.

BELCOUR.

Mr. Dudley, here is a fair refugee, who properly comes under your protection; ſhe is equipt for Scotland land, but your good fortune, which I have related to her, ſeems intended to ſave you both the journey.—— Nay, Madam, never go back; you are ammongſt friends.

CHARLES.

Charlotte!

CHARLOTTE.

The fame, that fond officious girl, that haunts you every where; that perſecuting ſpirit——

CHARLES.

Say rather, that protecting angel; ſuch you have been to me.

CHARLOTTE.

O Charles, you have an honeſt, but proud heart.

CHARLES.

Nay, chide me not, dear Charlotte.

BELCOUR.

Seal up her lips then; ſhe is an adorable girl; her arms are open to you; and love and happineſs are ready to receive you.

CHARLES.

Thus then I claim my dear, my deſtin'd wife.

[embracing her.

SCENE VIII.

Lady RUSPORT enters.

Lady RUSPORT.

Heyday! mighty fine! wife truly! mighty well! kiſſing, embracing—did ever any thing equal this? Why you ſhameleſs huſſey!—But I won't condeſcend to waſte a word upon you.——You, Sir, you, Mr. Stockwell, you fine, ſanctified, fair-dealing man of conſcience, is this the principle you trade upon? Is this your neighbourly ſyſtem, to keep a houſe of reception for run-away daughters, and young beggarly fortune-hunters?

O'FLAHERTY.

O'FLAHERTY.

Be advis'd now, and don't put yourſelf in ſuch a paſſion; we were all very happy till you came.

Lady RUSPORT.

Stand away, Sir; hav'nt I a reaſon to be in a paſſion?

O'FLAHERTY.

Indeed, honey, and you have, if you knew all.

Lady RUSPORT.

Come, Madam, I have found out your haunts; diſpoſe yourſelf to return home with me: young man, let me never ſee you within my doors again: Mr. Stockwell, I ſhall report your behaviour, depend on it.

STOCKWELL.

Hold, Madam, I cannot conſent to loſe Miſs Ruſport's company this evening, and I am perſuaded you won't inſiſt upon it; 'tis an unmotherly action to interrupt your daughter's happineſs in this manner, believe me it is.

Lady RUSPORT.

Her happineſs truly; upon my word! and I ſuppoſe it's an unmotherly action to interrupt her ruin; for what but ruin muſt it be to marry a beggar? I think my ſiſter had a proof of that, Sir, when ſhe made choice of you. [To Captain Dudley.

DUDLEY.

Don't be too laviſh of your ſpirits, Lady Ruſport.

O'FLAHERTY.

By my ſoul you'll have occaſion for a ſip of the cordial Elixir by and bye.

STOCKWELL.

It don't appear to me, Madam, that Mr. Dudley can be call'd a beggar.

Lady RUSPORT.

But it appears to me, Mr. Stockwell; I am apt to think a pair of colours cannot furniſh ſettlement quite ſufficient for the heireſs of Sir Stephen Ruſport.

CHARLOTTE.

CHARLOTTE.

But a good eſtate in aid of a commiſſion may do ſomething.

Lady RUSPORT.

A good eſtate, truly! where ſhou'd he get a good eſtate pray?

STOCKWELL.

Why ſuppoſe now a worthy old gentleman on his death-bed ſhould have taken it in mind to leave him one——

Lady RUSPORT.

Hah! what's that you ſay?

O'FLAHERTY.

O ho! you begin to ſmell a plot, do you?

STOCKWELL.

Suppoſe there ſhould be a paper in the world that runs thus—— "I do hereby give and bequeath all my "eſtates, real and perſonal, to Charles Dudley, ſon of "my late daughter Louiſa, &c. &c. &c."

Lady RUSPORT.

Why I am thunder-ſtruck! by what contrivance, what villany did you get poſſeſſion of that paper?

STOCKWELL.

There was no villany, Madam, in getting poſſeſſion of it; the crime was in concealing it, none in bringing it to light.

Lady RUSPORT.

Oh, that curſed lawyer, Varland!

O'FLAHERTY.

You may ſay that, faith, he is a curſed lawyer, and a curſed piece of work I had to get the paper from him; your ladyſhip now was to have paid him five thouſand pounds for it, I forc'd him to give it me of his own accord for nothing at all, at all.

Lady RUSPORT.

Is it you that have done this? Am I foil'd by your blundering contrivances, after all?

O'FLAHERTY.

O'FLAHERTY.

'Twas a blunder, faith, but as natural a one as if I'd made it o' purpoſe.

CHARLES.

Come, let us not oppreſs the fallen; do right even now, and you ſhall have no cauſe to complain.

Lady RUSPORT.

Am I become an object of your pity then? Inſufferable! confuſion light amongſt you! marry and be wretched: let me never ſee you more. [Exit.

CHARLOTTE.

She is outrageous; I ſuffer for her, and bluſh to ſee her thus expoſed.

CHARLES.

Come, Charlotte, don't let this angry woman diſturb our happineſs: we will ſave her in ſpite of herſelf; your father's memory ſhall not be ſtained by the diſcredit of his ſecond choice.

CHARLOTTE.

I truſt implicitly to your diſcretion, and am in all things yours.

BELCOUR.

Now, lovely but obdurate, does not this example ſoften?

LOUISA.

What can you aſk for more? Accept my hand, accept my willing heart.

BELCOUR.

O bliſs inutterable! brother, father, friend, and you the author of this general joy——

O'FLAHERTY.

Bleſſing of St. Patrick upon us all! 'tis a night of wonderful and ſurprizing ups and downs: I wiſh we were all fairly ſet down to ſupper, and there was an end on't.

STOCKWELL.

STOCKWELL.

Hold for a moment! I have yet one word to interpoſe—Intitled by my friendſhip to a voice in your diſpoſal, I have approv'd your match; there yet remains a father's conſent to be obtain'd.

BELCOUR.

Have I a father?

STOCKWELL.

You have a father; did not I tell you I had a diſcovery to make? Compoſe yourſelf: you have a father, who obſerves, who knows, who loves you.

BELCOUR.

Keep me no longer in ſuſpence; my heart is ſoften'd for the affecting diſcovery, and nature fits me to receive his bleſſing.

STOCKWELL.

I am your father.

BELCOUR.

My father? Do I live?

STOCKWELL.

I am your father.

BELCOUR.

It is too much; my happineſs o'erpowers me; to gain a friend and find a father is too much; I bluſh to think how little I deſerve you. [They embrace.

DUDLEY.

See, children, how many new relations ſpring from this night's unforeſeen events, to endear us to each other.

O'FLAHERTY.

O my conſcience, I think we ſhall be all related by and bye.

STOCKWELL.

How happily has this evening concluded, and yet how threatning was its approach! let us repair to the ſupper room, where I will unfold to you every circumſtance of my myſterious ſtory. Yes, Belcour, I have watch'd watch'd you with a patient, but enquiring eye, and I have discover'd thro' the veil of some irregularities, a heart beaming with benevolence, an animated nature, fallible indeed, but not incorrigible; and your election of this excellent young lady makes me glory in acknowledging you to be my son.

BELCOUR.

I thank you, and in my turn glory in the father I have gained: sensibly impress with gratitude for such extraordinary dispensations, I beseech you, amiable Louisa, for the time to come, whenever you perceive me deviating into error or offence, bring only to my mind the Providence of this night, and I will turn to reason and obey.

END OF THE PLAY.

EPILOGUE.

Written by ~~D. G.~~ Esq.

SPOKEN BY

Mrs. ABINGTON.

N. B. The Lines in Italics are to be ſpoken in a ridiculous Taſte.

CONFESS, good folks, has not Miſs Ruſport ſhewn
Strange whims for SEVENTEEN HUNDRED SEVENTY-SEVEN?
What, pawn her jewels!——there's a precious plan!
To extricate from want a brave old man;
And fall in love with poverty and honour;
A girl of fortune, faſhion!——Fie upon her.
But do not think we females of the ſtage,
So dead to the refinements of the age,
That we agree with our old faſhion'd poet:
I am point blank againſt him, and I'll ſhew it;
And that my tongue may more politely run,
Make me a lady——Lady Blabington,
Now, with a rank and title to be free,
I'll make a catechiſm—and you ſhall ſee,
What is the veritable Beeume de Vie:
As I change place, I ſtand for that, or this,
My Lady queſtions firſt——then anſwers Miſs.

(She ſpeaks as my Lady.)

" Come, tell me, Child, what were our modes and dreſs,
" In thoſe ſtrange times of that old fright Queen Beſs?"——
And now for Miſs——

(She changes place, and ſpeaks for Miſs.)

When Beſs was England's queen,
Ladies were diſmal beings, ſeldom ſeen;
They roſe betimes, and breakfaſted as ſoon
On beef and beer, then ſtudied Greek till noon;
Unpainted cheeks with bloſh of health did glow,
Beruff'd and fardingal'd from top to toe,
Nor necks, nor ancles would they ever ſhew.

Learnt Greek!—(laughs.)—Our outſide head takes half a day;
Have we much time to dreſs the inſide, pray?
No heads dreſs'd à la Greque; the ancients quote,
There may be learning in a papillote:

PROLOGUE.

Cards are our claſſicks; and I, Lady B,
In learning will not yield to any ſhe,
Of the late founded female univerſity.
But now for Lady Blab——.

(Speaks as my Lady.)

"Tell me, Miſs Nancy,
"What ſports and what employments did they fancy?"

(Speaks as Miſs.)

The vulgar creatures ſeldom left their houſes,
But taught their children, work'd, and lov'd their ſpouſes;
The uſe of cards at Chriſtmas only knew,
They play'd for little, and their games were few,
One-and-thirty, Put, All fours, and Lanterloo;
They bore a rate at Hot-Cockles ſtout and bonny,
And never heard the name of Macarony.——

(Speaks as my Lady.)

"Oh brava, brava! that's my pretty dear——.
"Now let a modern, modiſh fair appear;
"No more of theſe old dowdy maids and wives,
"Tell how ſuperior beings paſs their lives."——

(Speaks as Miſs.)

Till noon they ſleep, from noon till night they dreſs,
From night till morn they game it more or leſs,
Next night the ſame ſweet courſe of joy run o'er,
Then the night after as the night before,
And the night after that, encore, encore!——

(She comes forward.)

Thus with our cards we ſhuffle off all ſorrow,
To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow:
We deal apace, from youth unto our prime,
To the laſt moment of our tabby-time:
And all our yeſterdays, from rout and drum,
Have lighted fools with empty pockets home.
Thus do our lives with rapture roll away,
Not with the nonſenſe of our author's play;
This is true life—true ſpirit—give it praiſe;
Don't ſnarl and ſigh for good Queen Beſs's days:
For all you look ſo ſour, and bend the brow,
You all rejoice with me, you're living now.

4 AP 64